

Chapter 1 : Satire: From Aesop to Buchwald by Frederick T. Kiley

I read this as part of a course on the philosophy of laughter, humor and satire offered at Boston College in the fall of If you're looking for a good anthology of humorous writing from across the centuries, this is it.

We do not see because we do not have to. Well, the farmer on his own land must see, and the fire watcher in the forest, and the entomologist, and on and on. Even the dictionary makers are against us: Oxford University Press revealed a list of the entries it no longer felt to be relevant to a modern-day childhood [in the Oxford Junior Dictionary]. The deletions included acorn, adder, ash, beech, bluebell, buttercup, catkin, conker, cowslip, cygnet, dandelion, fern, hazel, heather, heron, ivy, kingfisher, lark, mistletoe, nectar, newt, otter, pasture and willow. The words taking their places in the new edition included attachment, block-graph, blog, broadband, bullet-point, celebrity, chatroom, committee, cut-and-paste, MP3 player and voice-mail. What the Oxford University Press has done is replace words from the world of nature with words from the technological construct we are building. Is it not the job of the poet to hold on to, bring back, invent again the language of seeing? So we can fall in love with the world, or fall in love with the world again, or remember how it was to be in love with it. He has published poetry, science fiction, and articles on subjects as varying as golf and Shakespeare. Wordrunner Press published a memoir in entitled, Talk in the Reading Room. He has published poems in many journals, has written science fiction, as well as articles on subjects as varying as golf and Shakespeare. Publications Has published much poetry in many journals including: Talk in the Reading Room, selected by the editors to be the memoir published by Wordrunner Press as an echapbook in Earth Fire Water Air in conjunction with Lorraine Chapperal a watercolorist, a collection of poems each with a watercolor in In his introduction to Comedy of Desire, Robert Bly said: I also admire the generosity of praise in these poems. Here are some remarks about his latest collection, A Walk to the Center of Things. With almost effortless craft and a superbly tuned ear for the music of language, he reveals the luminous within the everyday events of our lives. Received a Senatorial Citation from Senator Dianne Feinstein on the occasion of his 70th birthday for his work as a teacher, poet, and supporter of the arts. I persuaded the distinguished poets John Logan and Robert Hass to come teach. It was the first event of its kind in the area that I know of and it made us understand that such an event could be successful, that there was a hunger for poetry in our valley. The program was an astonishing success, the readings and lectures well attended by students, faculty, and the general public. Sometimes the hall was filled to overflowing. The poetry contest was so successful, the entries of such high quality, that the distinguished judges, Josephine Miles, Robert Hass, and Kathleen Fraser, said we should try to find a way of keeping them together. With that we created a wonderful collection of poems entitled Discover America as a special edition of San Jose Studies. The program was so successful, that we presented a similar one the following year, again with the aid of the Fine Arts Commission of San Jose. Though we did not go on beyond in this particular way, in part because of battle fatigue, we did go on in other ways. Both of these organizations have had a great impact on the poetry-literary community of our area. The event has been held at the Hotel Ste. I have done other such readings.
