Super Bowl anti-terrorism docs left on plane They were admonished not to share their contents with anyone who lacked "an operational need-to-know. A CNN employee discovered copies of them, along with other sensitive DHS material, in the seat-back pocket of a commercial plane. The reports were accompanied by the travel itinerary and boarding pass of the government scientist in charge of BioWatch, the DHS program that conducted the anthrax drills in preparation for Super Bowl LII in Minneapolis. The reports were based on exercises designed to evaluate the ability of public health, law enforcement and emergency management officials to engage in a coordinated response were a biological attack to be carried out in Minneapolis on Super Bowl Sunday. Read More The exercises identified several areas for improvement, including the problem that "some local law enforcement and emergency management agencies possess only a cursory knowledge of the BioWatch program and its mission. Houlton, an agency spokesman. Juliette Kayyem, a former DHS official who now serves as a CNN contributor, said it was not surprising that the documents highlighted deficiencies. She said such exercises are designed to expose gaps in planning and preparedness so that authorities "are better equipped if something bad were to happen. In the end, confidence in the federal government at a time of crisis is what the American public deserves. Based on that concern, CNN is withholding some details contained in the documents. The exercises -- one in July, the other in early November –" were built around the response to an intentional anthrax release that coincides with the Super Bowl. Among the findings was that there were "differences of opinion" over how many people had been exposed, "which led to differences of opinion on courses of action. This "made it difficult for them to assess whether their city was at risk," the documents stated, and "creates a situation where local officials are deciding on courses of action from limited points of view. The travel itinerary and boarding pass accompanying the documents was in the name of Michael V. Walter, a microbiologist, has been the program manager of BioWatch since , according to his LinkedIn profile. He held previous posts with the Central Intelligence Agency and Naval Surface Warfare Center and has 20 years of experience with biological warfare research. Walter, 59, did not respond to requests for comment for this article. A DHS official said the missing documents were the subject of an "operational review" and that "DHS does not comment on personnel matters or potential pending personnel action. Multiple government reports issued over the course of more than a decade have raised questions about its cost and effectiveness. A report by the Government Accountability Office struck a similar tone when it said "considerable uncertainty" exists about the types and sizes of biological attacks the system could detect. The report states that because DHS did not develop "performance requirements" for the program, the agency could not make informed decisions about how to upgrade it. An agency official noted in an email to CNN that "Biodetection is one aspect of a layered approach to biodefense," and that "DHS continues to develop requirements and field enhancements to our national biodefense.
