I mean, two girls and now twin sons in three years! I just wanted a little more of Shea and Elli. This was a sweet short story showing us their married life and their kids. February Karson King pushed himself as he skated up the ice and back along with his teammates. A cloud whooshed out with every breath he let out; his lungs were burning, and so were his legs. The rink was cold, and he loved the sound his skates made against the ice, along with those of his twenty-nine teammates. It was seven in the morning, and he was tired from staying out way too late the night before, but he loved this. Hockey was his life. He ate, slept, and breathed hockey since he was old enough to stand in his skates. It was all he knew; it was all he cared about. This was his life, and he was ready to do everything he could to make his dreams come true. And that was making it into the pros. He had done everything to get there. He played hockey days a year, trained with the best coaches, went to the best camps, and never started a day without a morning skate and a little puck handling. He was taught to be the best by his father, who played for twenty-one seasons in the pros before getting hurt and having to retire. He, along with his family, believed that the Chicago Cats were one of the stepping-stones to get him to the pros. He loved his Cats family. In the two years of being here, since he skipped going into the draft at eighteen, he had made friends for life and worked to polish his skills even more. His mother, Regina, was very adamant about him going to college for at least two years to make sure that hockey was really what he wanted to do with his life, despite the many scouts who begged him to go into the draft. So he did, and while he believed it was a complete waste of time, he was glad he was able to meet the guys he had and to be trained by one of the greatest college coaches around. He had enjoyed the life he had here in Chicago, but he was ready to be drafted. He was ready to play for the big leagues. Passing the puck up to his friend, Grady Martin, Karson crashed the net, going around it before hitting the slot where Grady slid him a beauty of a pass, resulting in an awesome top-shelf goal. Doing a small fist pump, Karson turned to congratulate his teammates before throwing his arm around him. Passes have to be hard and accurate if we are going to beat NYU tomorrow.

I really liked how it was easy to imagine yourself cheering for the team to being on ice with them. What I really liked about the set up in hindsight because Toni Aleo ripped by heart with the ending to Tangled in the Laces and I hated how it was set up at the time is that it allows any reader to come in and pick up an established series without the pressure of reading said series. Emotional rollercoaster-I know it can be pretty depressing to read about cancer, but the authors wrote strong characters. Each character struggles with their own personal demons in their own way. I laughed and cheered for the survivors and yet, cried my eyes out at how unfair life can be. What I really liked about Seduced by the Game, is how each author gave us strong characters with a personal journey. Reply tammy ramey on April 12, at 3: I am normally a huge fan of the novels but I felt very angry at the way Karson and Lacey ended. Instead we have a very emotional story of heartbreak and sadness with no resolution. Yes, it goes for an excellent cause, but I should of just donated money to the cause and not bothered with the emotional game being played and the long wait until the story completes. Reply mel on April 25, at 9: It ended so sadly that I was crying so hard that I had to leave the bed so my husband could get back to sleep. Is there no way that this story could be released sooner?
