Cranky's reviews have made me cry with laughter over the years. I am glad to finally have the opportunity to keep them in a nicely bound book on my bookshelf instead of all those pesky printed pages of copyrighted material.

Cranky Movie Reviews logo If you find that most films fill you with nothing but loathing and contempt, then Mr. Cranky movie reviews will be right up your alley. Cranky puts forth the notion that all movies suck: Represented by a purple, self-gagging frowny-face, Mr. Cranky rates all films on a six-step scale. The best rating a film can receive is one bomb, and the bomb ratings go all the way up to four. But not all reviews found on the site are so negative. Each year around Halloween, a guest reviewer named Mr. Smiley drops by to give the good news about Hollywood films. The exact opposite of the Mr. Cranky movie reviews, Mr. In , it appeared as though Mr. Cranky Rates the Movies. The Crankiest Movie Reviews Ever. Spice World " Mr. Cranky sums up this film in just three short words. Max Payne " Another atomic bomb rating, this time for the stylized cop tale starring Marky Mark minus the Funky Bunch. There is a plot with the depth of a baby pool, and it exists solely to drag the audience to the next scene, but that next scene is almost never a shootout or a slaughter. Instead we get another noir or crime cliché that has somehow become more boring than it already was. Casablanca can now fall silent: As the end of the twentieth century nears, Good Burger has achieved cinematic perfection. I Am Sam " Another atomic bomb rating, this time for a film about a mentally challenged man Sean Penn who fights to keep custody of his daughter with the help of a scrappy lawyer Michelle Pfeiffer. Needless to say, he was more than a little confused and pissed off. Cranky movie reviews, be sure to visit his official site.

No, actually, your late, baseball-loving grandfather never did it. The World Series was played during the day back then. No, no, no, no and no. Get off my lawn, you damn kids! October could conceivably be Mr. The baseball-industrial complex has gotten used to that, as evidenced by all the cool cold-weather gear worn this week by the Red Sox and Dodgers that undoubtedly will be bought as holiday gifts by all of us wannabes already anticipating the arrival of pitchers and catchers in February. In these days of dinnertime darkness and fall-semester academic commitments, the National Pastime has become the National Past-Your-Bedtime. Game 1 of the World Series began on Tuesday night at 8: One of your key target demographics needs to finish its homework and brush its teeth. Baseball wants and needs to corral younger fans. That much is certain. This makes sense both tactically and strategically. So why, then, ensure that the electrically charged season climax is either a off limits to those who live in stricter households or b a source of scratchiness between parents and kids otherwise predisposed to love baseball together and not have it come between them? Yes, you need to have night games. Yes, the networks call some of the time-slot shots. That extra hour could make all of this accessible to so many more people and ensure that your family fans, tucked away in their homes with Halloween pumpkins out front, are shouting at the screen together and not at each other. Take it from those shouting up at you from the parent-child trenches: This is probably an issue that warrants a committee or a task force or a bipartisan commission, if not a special prosecutor. The Red Sox, bolstered by J. On the floor, wrapped in a blanket like an oversized convenience-store burrito, lies an almostyear-old baseball fan who spent the earlier part of the evening beseeching his father to let him stay up and watch. And watch he did, raptly â€” through about the sixth inning. Eight hours later, on Thursday morning, some of his first words as he begins his daily resistance to getting out of bed and getting moving for school are these: And we smile, knowingly, at the pleasant, American subversiveness of it all â€” kids who loved and love baseball so much that they instigate mild rebellions to avoid bedtime and get their fixes. Bear that in mind, Major League Baseball, as you decide on start times for the games we once dreamed of playing in and now would like to let our sweet but occasionally combative children watch unfettered. Now get off my lawn. Follow him on Twitter at anthonyted.
