Additional Information In lieu of an abstract, here is a brief excerpt of the content: That debate was not so much over a movie that glorified a purveyor of misogynistic smut but over the choice of a pornographer as a kind of ideal violator of public values and hence a suitable subject for a film in celebration of freedom of speech. The argument against this is a telling one is that the rhetoric of the film, in its creation of a character with whom the audience could identify, chose a pornographer in lieu of, say, a Nazi bent on marching through Skokie, and thereby implicitly suggested that pornography is on some larger scale of public values a more fundamentally benign violation. Much of the argument over Times Square is also framed as a question about the rights of the sex trade and like the debate over Flynt is often couched in a veneer of standard-issue liberal pieties. These include not simply the notion that the sex industry is entitled to a kind of locational freedom of the city but also the idea as expressed, among others, by Rem Koolhaas in Grand Street last year that Times Square has a special "authenticity" bred of the coupling of pornography and density and is thus entitled to absolute tolerance. Of course, this particular argument works best retrospectively, as counterpoint to the looming Disneyfication of the place. As with the Forman film, the freedom the license of the sex scene is to be preferred to the homogenizing repressions of the mouse. And, like the Forman film, the same fallacy is unpacked. But the Forman film suggests another, even more serious consequence of current strategies toward Times Square. This all-or-nothing approach, which refuses to make distinctions within the field of the pornographic, leads with little difficulty to an identification of the pornographic with sexuality in general. At the end of the day, this is ironically the problem of the film. Embraced under the shining aura of "free speech," all sexual practices become as one. In Times Square this leads to a false choice: Disneyland symbolized by that hairless, sexless mouse is the representation of the kind of totalizing approach that is anathema to what has been best about Times Square, its complexity, unpredictability, louche charm, and yes its concentration of sexual energy. Disneyland is the postmodern version of urban renewal, advanced not on the theoretical grounds of a hygienic fantasy of a universal working-class subject living in circumstances of utter sameness, but on the grounds of a hygienic fantasy of a universal tourist-class subject playing in circumstances of utter sameness. Either way, the agenda is the same. In making this argument, I raise one of the great and necessary difficulties of the discussion of Times Square. Times Square is burdened by the competing claims of the exemplary and the exceptional. Clearly, the "otherness" of the place and its historic role as a sanctuary for both diversity and deviance simultaneously attract liberal opinion and appall a proper bourgeois sense of urban decorum. More, in the richly coded language of urban description, Times Square has come to symbolize not simply a criminal environment but a zone in which "the criminal element" which is to say black and gay men You are not currently authenticated. ### Chapter 3 : CE Center - Some Assembly Required

Brough Superiors claimed the top four places among the top sales at Bonhams' annual two-day Autumn Stafford Sale of motorcycles, held over the weekend in conjunction with the Classic Motorcycle Mechanics Show at Stafford, England.

I bought it in and worked on it a bit for a couple years, then put it away. I am now able to work a little harder, so am making progress. I bought my Chevelle in It was a California desert car so had no rust. It had only a few door dings and no sign of having been hit and fixed in the past. It did have a bad enamel paint job. It leaked every kind of fluid. When I got it home, I drove it around the block a few times, and tried my best to get the tires to spin even a little bit. Then I took the body off. The frame has scratches on it from the dies when it was formed. I had it sandblasted, painted it, and added dropped front spindles, slightly stiffer springs, and big roll bars. My plan from the beginning included a one-piece fiberglass tilt front, so I sold all the front sheet metal, the and powerglide, and the factory air conditioning. The only source I could find for the tilt front was Unlimited Fiberglass, and they only sold fenders and hood separately. The quality was terrible, but there was no other source, so I put many hours into making the three pieces into one unit that fit together. Then I got into restoring Corvettes, so put the Chevelle into a pole barn until last spring. Here it is in the light of day for the first time in years. First step was to finalize the hinge assembly, then to brace and reinforce the front clip. The factory braces were for a flat hood, so I had to cut them out and re-bond them to the cowl induction hood. Then I made the mounts for the bottoms of the fenders. Meanwhile I am thinking about color. I bought a couple of shades of red and sprayed the door and quarter. And my grandkids helped decorate. I am now leaning towards a metallic green. There is a nice color on GMC pickups that I like. Somewhere in here, I bought electric actuators to raise and lower the hood. I made mounting brackets, figured out the DPDT wiring, and tested the whole system with a jumper battery. The front went up and down beautifully! So I took it all apart and wrapped it up until final assembly.
