The other important thing to realize about the speaker is that she's telling the story in the past tense. In this way, there are two Elizabeths in the poem. There's the young Elizabeth in the waiting room, and then there's the older Elizabeth who recounts her experience in the waiting room.

Osa and Martin Johnson laced boots, and pith helmets. I read it right straight through. I was too shy to stop. I scarcely dared to look to see what it was I was. I knew that nothing stranger had ever happened, that nothing stranger could ever happen. Why should I be my aunt, 75 or me, or anyone? What similarities boots, hands, the family voice I felt in my throat, or even the National Geographic 80 and those awful hanging breasts held us all together or made us all just one? The waiting room was bright 90 and too hot. It was sliding beneath a big black wave, another, and another. Then I was back in it. The War was on. Outside, 95 in Worcester, Massachusetts, were night and slush and cold, and it was still the fifth of February, Observations "In the Waiting Room," starts simply with a child speaker, but ultimately questions what it means to be a woman. Visually, the poem is very simple. Though stanzas vary in length, they stay fairly constant in terms of width. At first I did not understand this, but Bishop is suggesting that it is embarrassing to only give a short, shy, polite cry of pain if something is hurting you. The second and third stanzas are similar in length. The second stanza makes her epiphany more concrete and we or this is when I did finally understand what she is getting at--by "them" 61 she means women, and by "it" 64 she is referring to the idea of gender. This is when you realize the connection between all the pieces that she had been dispensing. In the third stanza, the girl realizes that she has already become a woman in soem aspects and is on her way to becoming one. I interpreted this entire poem as a flashback, with the speaker looking back at her experience in the waiting room when she was a six-year-old girl.

He played football for Gerry Faust, who later coached for Notre Dame. Faust, 75, remembers Boehner as "the kind of guy who gave his all, all the time," despite back trouble from a basketball injury. After high school, it took Boehner most of a decade to get through night school at Xavier University, working odd jobs before landing at Nucite Sales, where he made his fortune. Babies with pointed heads wound round and round with string; black, naked women with necks wound round and round with wire like the necks of light bulbs. Their breasts were horrifying. I read it right straight through. I was too shy to stop. And then I looked at the cover: Suddenly, from inside, came an oh! What took me completely by surprise was that it was me: Without thinking at all I was my foolish aunt, I--we--were falling, falling, our eyes glued to the cover of the National Geographic, I said to myself: I was saying it to stop the sensation of falling off the round, turning world But I felt: Why should you be one, too? I scarcely dared to look to see what it was I was. I knew that nothing stranger had ever happened, that nothing stranger could ever happen. Why should I be my aunt, or me, or anyone? The waiting room was bright and too hot. It was sliding beneath a big black wave, another, and another. Then I was back in it. The War was on. Outside, in Worcester, Massachusetts, were night and slush and cold, and it was still the fifth of February, Analysis In The Waiting Room is a free verse poem. There is no regular, set end-rhyme scheme to the lines and no rhythmic pattern. Some lines are trimeter, others dimeter, with variations, but the overall impression is that the form is prose chopped into punctuated lines. Read it out loud and it is this careful use of punctuation, together with enjambment, that guides the voice and pace and understanding. For example, look at these lines from the second stanza: Without thinking at all I was my foolish aunt, I - we - were falling, falling, our eyes glued to the cover of the National Geographic, February, Alliteration occurs from time to time - while I waited - beneath a big black wave - which brings interest to the texture of the words; and assonance is used - wound round and round. The simile - like the necks of light bulbs - helps the reader picture exactly what the girl is seeing in the National Geographic. Further Analysis First Stanza lines The scene is set. Simple start, simple language. Yet as the first stanza progresses the little girl becomes increasingly aware of the slightly oppressive atmosphere. She notices the early dark, the grown ups, her aunt being a long time. To keep boredom at bay she picks up a National Geographic. The pictures signify the impending change. First an erupting volcano, then an eccentric couple, then a dead man who might be a meal for cannibals, and pointy headed babies, black naked women with saggy breasts and strange long necks - the images pile up and overwhelm the innocent girl. The breasts in particular. Second Stanza lines The reader is gradually taken into the mind of the girl, focused on the pages of the National Geographic but then a cry of pain from her aunt brings the speaker back into the reality of the waiting room. This reality is short-lived however. The girl instinctively connects with her own blood and cannot stop herself - she is her aunt, two become one and they are falling, the girl is falling out of her childhood and into a different dimension. More Analysis Third Stanza lines The consciousness of the child is changing - she becomes aware of her connection with her aunt and all the others gathered in the waiting room. This is a shockingly odd revelation. Everyone is in this world together and even the girl herself will become one of them, she will grow up, become a woman with breasts. Despite her questions and existential doubts, growing into an adult will be painful, involve a few screams perhaps, but the process is unavoidable. Note the use of specific language to help reinforce the idea of alienation and discomfort: I gave a sidelong glance shadowy Fifth Stanza lines At the end is there a sign of relief for this girl who seems to want time to stop and her growth hormones to not exist? The girl, with no mention of Aunt Consuelo, no mention of the dental appointment ending, simply admits that it is still February, she is still in Massachusetts, and humanity is still at war. I wonder if she regretted ever picking up that National Geographic?
