With the exception of P. Bil named Steve in the early years of the strip works in an office, and he is believed to be a cartoonist, most likely based on the writer of the strip because he draws big circles on paper, presumably a cartoon version of the Family Circus. Thel is a college-educated homemaker. The Los Angeles Times ran a feature article on the Thelma character when Keane updated her hairstyle in The oldest child is 7-year-old Billy. A recurring theme involves Billy as a substitute cartoonist, generally filling in for a Sunday strip. The strips purportedly drawn by Billy are crudely rendered and reflect his understanding of the world and sense of humor. The first use of this gag by Keane was in This Week magazine in in a cartoon titled "Life in Our House" which attributed the childish drawings to his 6-year-old son, Chris. Al died after the launch of the feature. Strips in the past have mentioned them living in Iowa, but one strip mentioned Florida. The family occasionally visits them for vacation. Pets[edit] The family pets are two dogs—a Labrador named Barfy and a shaggy-haired mutt named Sam, a stray the children brought home on January 26, and an orange tabby cat named Kittycat. Other characters[edit] Morrie is a playmate of Billy, and the only recurring black character in the strip. Keane created the character in as a tribute to his close friend Morrie Turner , creator of Wee Pals. They often visit a popular ice cream parlor named the Sugar Bowl based on the actual same-named restaurant which features many strips signed by Keane , and Jeffy once went to St. Thel was seen playing tennis with a racket marked "Scottsdale Racket", and Bil mentioned moving up to B class at Scottsdale Racket Club in a strip. Also, a sign for Paradise Valley , where Bil Keane lived the latter part of his life, is seen in one strip. Sometimes the family is depicted enjoying snow at their home in the strip, whereas Scottsdale gets very little snow in the winter. Bil Keane commented that he took scenes from his boyhood in Pennsylvania , such as snow, and added them to the strip. Religion[edit] One distinguishing characteristic of the Family Circus is the frequent use of Christian imagery and themes, ranging from generic references to God to Jeffy daydreaming about Jesus at the grocery store. Keane states that the religious content reflects his own upbringing and family traditions. William Parish in Philadelphia. The earliest appearance of the dotted line was on April 8, an un-dotted path had first appeared on February In an interview, Jeff Keane, who now produces the strip, described how he creates the line: Cause" were introduced in later years. Although it is clear that the parents do not accept the existence of the gremlins, they did include them as members of the family, perhaps tongue-in-cheek , when being interviewed by a member of the U. Grown children[edit] One theme Keane tried from time to time was picturing the children as adults, or what might come of it. One time when Billy had been asked by Thelma not to leave the house until he finished his homework, she told him, "One day when you are grown up you will thank me for this! Other adult ideas included the parents telling Jeffy not to be shy when they invited friends over, and then he is pictured 25 years later as an outgoing late night talk show host akin to Jay Leno. Another example was P. Iaccoca is back there. The children enjoy showing off the new van to their friends: The panel is occasionally split in two halves. One unusual practice in the series is the occasional use of both speech balloons within the picture and captions outside the circle. The daily strip does not generally follow a weekly story arc , with the exception of family vacations. Sunday strip[edit] The format of the Sunday strip varies considerably from week to week, though there are several well-known recurring themes. Book collections[edit] There are 89 compilations of Family Circus cartoons. For a full list of book titles, see Family Circus collections. Television[edit] The Family Circus characters appeared in animated form in three television holiday specials, all broadcast on NBC: Called Our House featuring the Family Circus a. Now and Then , the game compares life in modern times to those when the parents, grandparents and other ancestors of the comic were young. Parody[edit] The Family Circus has been widely satirized in film, television, and other daily comic strips. In an interview with The Washington Post , Keane said that he was flattered and believed that such parody " Keane claimed to have found the site funny at first. It juxtaposes the innocent artwork of the comic with the often adult dialogue from the show to parody both media phenomena. Robert Lennon , centered around a dysfunctional family whose late patriarch drew a cartoon similar to The Family Circus. Lennon later said, although there was a "resemblance", he did not "know anything about Bil Keane and made up my characters from scratch. In one series of strips, Rat is captured by Family Circus fans after poking fun at the Family Circus. The graphic novel The Fun Family by Benjamin Frisch tells the dark story of the family of the creator of a Family Circus-like strip. If too much coating starts to build up at the base of the stick, simply use your finger to wipe it off, spinning the lollipop stick at the same time. This can happen if the coating is too thin or too hot.

At age 4, I fished in the mud puddles in front of the house. We were serious about catching anything that would bite, including an occasional hellbender, plenty of chubs, suckers, bullheads, and panfish. But the greatest lure for me was the elusive and beautiful, trout. Shy to the point of painfulness, delicate in their feeding, and colored like the mottled farmlands of western Pennsylvania or the skies of heaven itself, they were the true trophy of my heart. And it has always been such. I sought them with unrelenting, youthful desire, and by the time I was in third grade, I was catching them with regularity, using the new spinning rod with side bail, Johnson reel that my father had so lovingly provided for his possessed child. Writers like Ted Trueblood, Al McClane, Joe Brooks, and the young Ernie Schwiebert haunted my imagination with stories of big trout taken on delicate dries or carefully fished nymphs and wet flies. And I was hooked. But they were my flies, and they caught fish. The first trout on a fly came in the spring of my 12th year. Though only 10 inches long—and probably stocked the week before—that rainbow has always been my biggest trophy. Not only because it was my first trout on a fly, but because a fishing neighbor witnessed the entire cast, hook, and land sequence and profusely complimented me on my skill. By age 16, when I could hit the highways to more distant waters, my tying and fishing skills were sufficient to fool enough trout to keep me coming back at every possible moment. Near the end of my junior year at Penn State, I met Nancy. There was instant and permanent chemistry. She was not just cute and funny, but she hunted, fly fished, tied flies, and played guitar. We got married in September after our senior year. When we arrived at the University of Wisconsin in , where I was to begin work on my Ph. They were great laboratories for developing fly design concepts, and their abundant hatches and excellent terrestrial offerings provided plenty of opportunities to experiment. It was there that the Para Ant and loop-wing concept for dries were first developed and tested. A Pseudocloeon hatch was in progress, and I caught a good number of small browns in the bright morning sun. The fish was hooked for only a few moments before being released, but Jason was hooked for life. That summer, we made our first trip to Montana, where Nancy saw the mountains for the first time in her life, and Jason caught his first trout all by himself from Squaw Creek, just south of Bozeman. It was a wonderful summer, and a wonderful beginning to our life-long involvement in fly fishing schools, articles, videos, books, seminars, club talks, sports shows, travel, and so much more. The first thing she will do when you walk into her home is invite you to sit down at the kitchen table while she steeps you a cup of tea. Everyone wants to linger in her presence. Linda is one of those beautiful souls who takes on both strangers and intimates as family the very instant they meet. There is no waiting period, no litmus test. The connection and the communion are almost instant. You have shown up at her front door, and therefore you are kin. I have a feeling that our lives would change dramatically if we were able to widen our hearts enough to welcome everyone in without exclusions. Mother Teresa alluded to this possibility when she told us, "The problem with the world is that we draw our family circle too small. They teach us that enlightenment rests in seeing ourselves in others and in recognizing others as our selves. For surely, we are all children of whatever light it is that has brought this world into existence and keeps the planets spinning year after year. And that makes us all kin. It takes so much energy to defend ourselves against one another, anyway. We waste a lot of time sniffing each other out before deciding whether we are friends or enemies, whether we are comforts or threats. Why not simply decide in advance to respond to one another with warmth and care, recognizing us all as members of the same team? Our minds and our hearts will be stretched and softened. No one will be left out. We will feel less lonely. We will save ourselves as we save the world, simply through inclusion. And there will be no more strangers left anywhere. Why not act as mother, father, sister, brother, auntie, nephew and cousin to all, just as an experiment, just to see what happens? You may be moved to call a long-lost friend to let her know you miss her presence in your life. And, you may even learn that your crazy uncle still shares many common bonds with you, even though you voted differently last fall. Through all of this, you will end up feeling a little more at home in the world, a fuller participant in the beautiful and lovely flow of life. Not everyone will respond in kind, for sure.

The Family Circle - Earth's Lost Is Heaven's Gain - Duration: childofGod 59, views. Country Gospel Song - Who Will Pray For Me When Mama's Gone - Duration:

Now that I am preparing for my trip back to the past to my homeland Mozambique in Africa that I left more than forty years ago it is inevitable to look back and think of the first years of my life but also of the years in between. My own circle of life. The memories of those years inevitably bring back the people whose life paths have been linked with mine. Family First of all I remember my family, who welcomed me as I arrived in this world. My mother and father and my maternal grandparents who were there for me from the first moment, guiding my first steps and showering me with love, and then giving me precious guidance and advice. Helping me to discern good from bad. As I grew up it was inevitable that I would not agree one hundred per cent with them but then this was also part of the legacy they would leave me: They raised me to be autonomous and gave me an education so that I might be an independent human being even if that meant that I would be the one to make my own choices, not them. And for that, and for all they have given me, I am eternally grateful. I was lucky to have them for many years in my life, and to know they were not disappointed in me. Friends The circle of life moved forward and from child to teenager friends became more and more important. New lives came across mine: Many would simply fade away when the circumstances that had brought us together ceased, such as school, holidays or university; but some of them have remained throughout my life, our friendship steady and strong, to last a lifetime and beyond, for who knows how many lives and times we may have crossed together. Some friends made later in life too, not many, but still good friends, born out of shared ideas and views of the world as well as common tastes. Love Love also came my way: And last but certainly not least, my children and the greatest love of all: As your children grow you get to know more of this new generation: The circle unfolds As the circle inexorably unfolds some of the people in your life begin departing. Suddenly your anchors are being taken away from you. And that awareness is hard to accept. At this point I stop and think I have been so incredibly blessed. I have had sad and unhappy days no one can expect a life without them but fortunately so many more happy and fulfilling moments. The circle of life has taken away some of my loved ones but at a time when they had fulfilled their lives, and it has given me new precious lives to love; it has brought me true friends who are unconditional; I have lived great loves and some disappointments too; I have been blessed with people with such generosity towards me that I will always be grateful to them no matter what; I have learned important lessons and keep learning them every day. Closing a chapter So as I prepare to go and make the most emotional journey of all so far I know it will somehow close a chapter in my life. With all the memories and loved ones of the past inside my heart, but with the present and future beside me: Nuno and my sons. And when we stand before the house of my childhood, of my past, and they help me dry the tears that will inevitably once again- pour down my cheeks, the wheel of life will have turned again once more. We will walk away together.
