People want a lot of things that they never do anything about. We all want to be in better shape. We all want to start eating healthier. We all want to learn new languages. We know that we should exercise more, eat less, speak from day 1. Future Benny is never going to have any better information about how to get started towards those goals than Right Now Benny does. So the question is: What would you be doing right now if you really wanted to learn a new language? There are a few big truths about this I want to make clear. And yet you are guilty of it, because thinking about learning a language is the same as doing nothing. Sorry to have to tell you this, but thinking about your goals will not get you any closer to achieving them. Only doing can do that. You might start to envision Future You learning Spanish, then going to Spain and making Spanish friends, ordering Sangria in the perfect Spanish accent, and being able to name 30 different types of tapas. This mental story – the process of imagining yourself going through all these steps – actually makes you feel like you have done something! And of course, in fact, you have done nothing but think your way out of taking action now. Planning to learn a new language is also doing nothing, by the way. Even the best laid plans are not actions. They are just organized thoughts. And definitely no language learning. Do not trust that feeling! I actually agree that figuring out what to do is too hard. What should I do to start learning Spanish? And actually, this question has a never-ending list of answers. It also has no answer. There are just lots and lots of options. I can, however, tell you this: Any time you spend thinking about, planning or researching the best way to learn a new language would have been better spent actually studying and speaking the language. So my advice to you is simple: Start learning, start speaking, start reading, and you will be doing more actual language learning than any amount of thinking or planning or researching can ever give you. The question I asked you at the start of this post was: But if you really, really want to learn Japanese, then just start. Start doing the thing you want to do right now. Recently, I launched a new email course that guides you through the process of starting a new language project. The trick appears in the very first day, when I give the starting challenge of the week. Step 1 is – Learn to say Hello. And then learn to say Nice to meet you. It pretty much goes on like that. You literally just start. Are you ready to start? I have, after all, been doing this a long time. But you need to decide right now to become more than just a hoarder of great language hacking ideas. Put these ideas to use already! Lauren, my girlfriend, just completed her first ever language mission in Esperanto, and at the end of her challenge she wrote about the importance of using lots of different methods. If at all possible, surround yourself with other people who are also learning a language to keep you motivated, to steal ideas from, and who will hold you accountable for getting started and moving forward. Now, Lauren is starting her next language challenge! I want to know what your language goals are, so tell me in the comments. From there, your challenge is this: Pick up a phrasebook. Join the Add 1 Challenge. Learn to say hello. Benny believes the best approach to language learning is to speak from day one.

What happens at our program? Come and find out! Saturday, January 28, Pete the Cat Literacy Event Friday was Family Literacy Day but all week our school district and local community have been offering literacy events. Our school offered an afternoon event for families to join in the StrongStart and Kindergarten classes to have fun with Pete the Cat. This book is very popular in our school. Thanks to Beyond the Book Storytimes for the idea. One of the teachers read the story while big Pete acted it out. Ready to start the story. Boxes represented the coloured piles, example; red strawberries, blue blueberries, brown mud and in the boxes were slippers to match the colour. Started with white slippers, then red, then blue, brown and back to white shoes. If you want to watch the video visit Here are the activities we did after the story. Some of them were found at MakingLearningFun. A coloured card has the word written on it. Coloured snap blocks have letters written on each. The children sort and build the word to match the card. Roll and colour page. Roll the die, count the dots or recognize the numeral then colour that spot on the page. An emergent reader for Pete the Cat that can be coloured according to what is happening on each page. Making patterns using potato stamps. Explaining which pattern he chose - ababab. We think Pete is great!

Etymology[edit] The term "profane" originates from classical Latin "profanus", literally "before outside the temple". It carried the meaning of either "desecrating what is holy" or "with a secular purpose" as early as the s. Moreover, many Bible verses speak against swearing. Because of this, profanity is sometimes referred to colloquially as "Anglo-Saxon". For example, the word wanker is considered profane in Britain but its origin dates only to the turn of the 20th Century. Functionally similar behavior can be observed in chimpanzees, and may contribute to our understanding, notes New York Times author Natalie Angier. They found that cursing is associated with negative emotions such as sadness Their finding that bilinguals strengthen the offensiveness of profanities when they switch into their second language, but soften it when they switch into their first tongue, but do both statistically significantly only in the case of ethnophaulisms ethnic slurs led the scientist to the conclusion that switching into the second language exempts bilinguals from the social norms and constraints whether own or socially imposed such as political correctness, and makes them more prone to swearing and offending others. These offences are classed as a summary offence. However, if the court is satisfied that the individual concerned had "a reasonable excuse to behave in such a manner", no offence is committed. However, direct offences against one can be considered a crime against honor , with penalty of imprisonment of one to three months or a fine. Provinces and municipalities may also have their own laws against swearing in public. For instance, the Municipal Code of Toronto bars "profane or abusive language" in public parks. However, if the defendant has "reasonable grounds for believing that his words would not be overheard" then no offence is committed. Also, "the court shall have regard to all the circumstances pertaining at the material time, including whether the defendant had reasonable grounds for believing that the person to whom the words were addressed, or any person by whom they might be overheard, would not be offended". However, it may be a criminal offence in Salford Quays under a public space protection order which outlaws the use of "foul and abusive language" without specifying any further component to the offence, although it appears to be unclear as to whether all and every instance of swearing is covered. Salford City Council claims that the defence of "reasonable excuse" allows all the circumstances to be taken into account. In the workplace In the United Kingdom, swearing in the workplace can be an act of gross misconduct under certain circumstances. In particular, this is the case when swearing accompanies insubordination against a superior or humiliation of a subordinate employee. However, in other cases it may not be grounds for instant dismissal. The site continues to explain that, even in a workplace in which swearing is the norm, there is no need to participate in it. Actionable indecency and United States obscenity law In the United States, courts have generally ruled that the government does not have the right to prosecute someone solely for the use of an expletive, which would be a violation of their right to free speech enshrined in the First Amendment. On the other hand, they have upheld convictions of people who used profanity to incite riots, harass people, or disturb the peace. Minced oath Minced oaths are euphemistic expressions made by altering or clipping profane words and expressions to make them less objectionable. Although minced oaths are often acceptable in situations where profanity is not including the radio , some people still consider them profanity. In , a judge threatened a lawyer with contempt of court for using the word darn.

Chapter 4 : Strong Start Referral Form - The SAFE Alliance

Where does your child learn language? From you, of course. He learns to speak by hearing others speak, gaining a working knowledge of syntax, grammar and meaning largely by osmosis. Ruth Beechick calls this the "natural method" of language acquisition, and demonstrates in A Strong Start in Language.
