He was related to the Anglo-Norman aristocracy and the Perche was a march border region in southern Normandy. When the Crusaders had to confront a Seljuk relief force two weeks later in open battle, Rotrou was one of the front line commanders. He fulfilled his vow and made it all the way to Jerusalem. Bishop and lawyer Ivo of Chartres could not resolve it, since it involved a judicial duel, over which the church was not allowed to preside, and so remitted it to the court of the County of Blois. The reigning pope, Paschal II, who was in Chartres in April, sent the case back to Ivo, who complained in a letter that since "this law of the Church protecting the goods of knights going to Jerusalem was new. Whereas his father had only held the title of viscount, Rotrou is usually called a count. He was not often in England, but is purported to have been close to his wife. He and a group of Normans are said to have fought the Muslims in the service of Alfonso the Battler, then King of Aragon and Navarre, until the Aragonese plotted against them and they returned home. After the death of his wife, eldest son and two of his nephews in the wreck of the White Ship, Rotrou returned to Spain. Neither is he mentioned in the charter of surrender of Tudela. Since he received land in Zaragoza after the conquest, it might be assumed that he sent either money or men to assist in the enterprise. His first participation was probably in the campaign against Lleida. An Aragonese charter dating to April refers to Rotrou as "count in Tudela", although it does not specifically refer to him as the ruler of the place. Robert is first mentioned in a charter issued by Rotrou in Spain, in which the count granted some houses in Zaragoza to a knight of his named Sabino in gratitude for his services December. There is a slightly later reference which shows that Rotrou was in control of Tudela and that he had appointed Robert to act as his alcalde mayor or military commander of the citadel and one Duran Pixon to act as administrator justiciar. Similar charters from February and November show that this arrangement continued for almost a decade, even though Rotrou was often absent in Normandy and Robert Burdet in Tarragona. Rotrou returned to Alfonso the Battler in, when he was at the Siege of Bayonne. On 26 October, from the siege, Alfonso granted the fuero previously given to Tudela to the small town of Corella. Rotrou was one of the signatories, since the castle of Corella had been granted to him by the king in December. During the period when she held the regency for her son "71, she raised to the chancellorship her cousin Stephen du Perche, a younger and illegitimate son of Rotrou. She also made Gilbert, another cousin from the Perche, count in Gravina. Another relation, Henry of Montescaglioso, was a son of Marguerite, perhaps illegitimate. Possible family tree of the counts of Perche. They had one daughter: Matilda drowned in the wreck of the White Ship on 20 November. They had two daughters: They had two sons:
