Lesser Antilles, which, extending from South America to Porto Rico, formed a natural way of intercommunication or migration of primitive races. The gathering of material in these excursions was especially successful, and important prehistoric objects from several of the islands visited were added to the existing collection in the National Museum. A general summary of the results of the expedition of has already been published in the Smithsonian Miscellaneous Collections," but this preliminary report was limited and only partially indicates the extent of the work performed or the amount and significance of the material collected. The collection made in was numerically somewhat smaller than that of , but not less important.

This volume, the result of his careful fieldwork in Puerto Rico in , is magnificently illustrated by 93 plates and 43 line drawings of specimens from both public and private collections of the islands.

Biography[ edit ] Fewkes was born in Newton, Massachusetts , and initially trained as a zoologist at Harvard University. He later turned to ethnological studies of the native tribes in the American Southwest. In , with the resignation of noted ethnologist Frank Hamilton Cushing , Fewkes became leader of the Hemenway Southwestern Archaeological Expedition, named for its patron Mary Hemenway. While with this project, Fewkes documented the existing lifestyle and rituals of the Zuni and Hopi tribes. Fewkes was the first man to use a phonograph to record indigenous people for study. He tested its use among the Passamaquoddy in Maine, before traveling to the Southwest to make his recordings of the Zuni and Hopi Benjamin Ives Gilman used these recordings to show that they used musical intervals unlike those in the Western tempered scale. In addition to the recordings, he wrote historically valuable descriptions of the music and musical practice. He particularly focused on the variants and styles of prehistoric Southwest Indian pottery , producing a number of volumes with carefully drawn illustrations. The Hopi potter Nampeyo became his friend and reproduced the newly documented traditional designs in her own work. This Codex Hopi, a manuscript of all the known Hopi Katsinam was the first permanent documentation of the ceremonial performers and preserved the existence of the Katsinam that otherwise may have ceased to appear. By the mids, vandalism of these sites was widespread. In the American Anthropologist for August , Fewkes described a large cliff dwelling called Palatki , or "Red House", situated in the Red Rock country southwest of Flagstaff, Arizona , and appealed for protective legislation. If this destruction of the cliff-houses of New Mexico , Colorado, and Arizona goes on at the same rate in the next fifty years that it has in the past, these unique dwellings will be practically destroyed, and unless laws are enacted, either by states or by the general government, for their protection, at the close of the twentieth century many of the most interesting monuments of the prehistoric peoples of our Southwest will be little more than mounds of debris at the bases of the cliffs. The proper designation of the way our antiquities are treated is vandalism. Students who follow us, when these cliff-houses have all disappeared and their instructive objects scattered by greed of traders, will wonder at our indifference and designate our negligence by its proper name. It would be wise legislation to prevent this vandalism as much as possible and good science to put all excavation of ruins in trained hands. A Theatrical Performance at Walpi. Additional Information In lieu of an abstract, here is a brief excerpt of the content: The object of these visits was the collection of data and specimens that would shed light on the prehistoric inhabitants of this West Indian island which had lately come into the possession of the United States. The work in was limited to Porto Rico, but the fact became evident, as it progressed, that the problem of the character of the aboriginal Antilleans could not be satisfactorily solved from material collected on anyone of the many West Indian islands. A special examination of neighboring islands for comparative studies became necessary. The gathering of material in these excursions was especially successful, and important prehistoric objects from several of the islands visited were added to the existing collection in the National Museum. A general summary of the results of the expedition <sup>01</sup> has already been published in the Smithsonian Miscellaneou.. The collection made in It contains several unique specimens that add greatly to the value of the material already acquired. The Neumann collection, which was the largest purchased in Among the important objects obtained this year are a fine effigy vase, three three-pointed idols presented by Senor Zoller, of the Aguirre Central, near Ponce, and a collection of stone implements from St Vincent, presented by Mr Jacobson, of Port of Spain, Trinidad. While the collections now in Washington serve as the basis of this article, the author has drawn some of his material from published descriptions, of Porto Rican prehistoric objects in the museums at New York, Copenhagen. Paris, Berlin, and London. The author is indebted for assistance in his West Indian field work to many friends, among whom should be specially mentioned Maj. Holmes, the present Chief. Numerous courtesies were extended to him by officials in Porto Rico, as well as by local archeologists in that and other islands. He takes this opportunity to express his thanks to all those to whom he has been indebted in the preparation of this work. Unfortunately, he has not been able to examine the West Indian antiquities in European museums, with the important exception of a few stone idols and implements in the Museo Arqueológico, Madrid. These objects and some others exhibited in the Exposición Histórica in that city in were examined by the author, who was able at that time to make sketches of the You are not currently authenticated.
