Emily Ruskovich grew up on Hoodoo Mountain in northern Idaho—a place of mystery and danger that fuels the story in her debut novel, which is earning reviews often reserved for best sellers. It answered all of my fears. Just like her writing. No place quite like it. Growing up in Idaho was so beautiful, so isolated and quite scary. Sometimes her family went without electricity or running water above the town of Blanchard. It was, in many ways, not a safe place for children to grow up. Yet, it was the most ideal place to grow up. My imagination is so strongly tied to Idaho. The book has already garnered acclaim usually reserved for best sellers. A wrenching and beautiful book," wrote The New York Times. When Ruskovich recently ventured to a grocery store near the tiny town of Alsea, Ore. My book," said Ruskovich. Not old enough to write or even spell her name, she dictated a poem to her mother: She recalled another moment from her youth that would ultimately serve as the inspiration for Idaho. I remember the crows, the birch wood I had this sense I felt the possibility of something terrible happening. She began publishing short stories, winning the prestigious O. Henry Award in I was so intimidated. But when my Random House editors expressed a similar sentiment, I forced myself to open up the possibility. And when I read Beloved by Toni Morrison, I had a new realization of structure; and through the years, my novel underwent major structural revisions. The book had become an absolute thing—a living, growing thing," she said. I could probably write this book forever. There was no real end. The perspectives could be infinite. Every few minutes, I had to breathe very deeply. Memories and Unspeakable Violence Idaho opens years after something terrible has happened. The mystery unfolds through the eyes of Ann, a northern Idaho schoolteacher and second wife to Wade—a divorcee, loner who is slowly experiencing the creep of dementia. She must also survive her personal hell: Wade shares only spare memories about the tragedy with Ann, leaving it to her to obsess over the critical missing pieces of the mystery. His pale eyelids stark on his sun-roughed face. His lips chapped, his cheeks unshaven. Such inherent kindness in his body that it was impossible to picture this man doing the things he had certainly done. Not chronological—much like memory itself, the events are scattered over the years until they finally find a place to settle in our consciousness. Eventually, Idaho leads us to Jenny herself and her life in an Idaho prison. The sentence was delivered from his mouth but was somehow separate from the man, as if the child voice spoke for him, too. As if the word could make it so. Our American editors loved it. My book had been fully edited, but the review committee had some concern about naming it Idaho, thinking it would be confused with non-fiction. Think of the magnetism of the word. When we got that beautiful, mysterious cover art, everyone agreed that it had to be Idaho. Idaho, the novel, is not unlike Idaho the state in that it is dense with mystery:

However, the countryside is incredibly beautiful and adventurous. If you are keen on a road trip, Morocco is a great destination and driving is not as daunting as it seems. Driving the most dangerous and most beautiful roads in Morocco is a great adventure. I have three itineraries for you to choose from: Interestingly, it is one of the least visited regions of the country but it has some of the most beautiful roads in Morocco. We took a long drive from Essaouira to Agadir and Tiznit, and then on to Taroudant, so it was a long day. I would recommend a day round trip out of Agadir, via Tafraoute and Ait-Baha. The road from Agadir is in very good condition, and flat, but not particularly attractive. In Tiznit, you will suddenly realise that you are in the south of Morocco. The women wear very colourful clothing and the Berber culture is dominant, with signs in the Amazigh language. Tiznit has a colourful market, worth stopping by for some photography. Then, the Anti Atlas mountain range starts rising. The Col du Kerdous has an impressive hotel overlooking the valley. We stopped at a hotel for an orange juice and wandered around for a while. We found people very friendly. Tafraoute is also known for its unique and colourful babouches, available in the market in the centre of town. The road becomes really beautiful and very torturous after Tafraoute. Whilst the road before the valley is quite plain and dry, the scenery comes to life when you enter the valley encased in the mountains. Now hosting a guesthouse, the 13th Century fortified village cuts an impressive presence in the valley. The road is quite good and apart from some tight bends, relatively easy to drive. We took a shortcut to make our way to Taroudant just after Ait-Baha. Photo Thierry Mignon The valley around Tafraoute is quite prosperous and we saw a number of newly built houses. After that, there is a steep climb into the mountains. The road is the only gateway to the South of Morocco and its desert, so it can get quite busy. If you are travelling south, I recommend taking this road in the morning and avoid any crowds. The thoroughfare is not just made of tourists, there are lots of trucks. Photo Thierry Mignon On the climb, the road is quite good, and some parts have recently been upgraded. Interestingly, the road is upgraded in chunks, so you may alternate between the old road and newly sealed road. At the time of our visit, we found a lot of road works in progress. We ran into stopped traffic on the way back and had to wait for an hour. This is not uncommon when you drive on the roads in Morocco. Photo Thierry Mignon We waited patiently and watched the ballet of trucks carving into the mountainside. There are shops selling minerals and the sellers are quite pushy, so we found no reason to hang around there too long. Telouet We took the road left towards Telouet and Ait Benhaddou. The Telouet Kasbah is the seat of power for the powerful Glaoui dynasty and the village was a point of passage for the caravans coming from the Sahara desert. During the French occupation, the ruler Pasha Glaoui offered his support to the French. The Glaoui family had considerable wealth and influence, thanks to the exploitation of local salt mines. The Kasbah was built in at great expense and has some beautiful stucco and zelliges decorations. However, the Glaoui family was removed from their power in by the independence movement. Due to the political connotation, there has been no public funding to renovate the place. The road to Telouet and Ait Benhaddou is seriously pot-holed. We managed fine in the dry weather and there was no-one around, but I wonder if it would be possible and safe taking a 2WD vehicle in rainy weather. The most difficult part is the 11 km from Telouet to Anmiter. More recently, Game of Thrones has been filmed here. You have to admit this is a beautiful sight and well worth tackling the roads in Morocco! Aside from the movie references, Ait Benhaddou is a spectacular fortified village. If you are lucky to get a sunny day, the colours are amazing. However, the kasbah is a beautiful example of pre-Saharan habitat. High walls and defensive corner towers protect the houses huddled together. When the river is too high to cross on foot, there used to be donkeys available for a small fee by the river bank. With the stop for lunch at Telouet, the drive from Marrakech to Ait Benhaddou took four hours and at least as much for the way back. It used to be the only road between Agadir and Marrakech and is incredibly torturous. The road stretching from Taroudant is flat and boring initially. But then the Atlas Mountains rise quickly and the climb starts. The road was damaged and under repairs at the start, which concerned me for the rest of the journey. However, things improved and the rest of the road was in decent condition. Photo Thierry Mignon The climb is very steep and we came across several trucks. There are several cafes along the road, where we had an orange juice and took in the gorgeous views. Nowadays, there is a straight and flat road from Agadir to Marrakech, which everyone takes. The road is absolutely spectacular. The climb is very steep and I had to wonder if the car would make it. Take a moment to look back at the climb and the valley in front of you. The French colonialists built the road between and The descent to the other side is not as steep and the scenery is quite different. The Almohads launched their military campaigns against the Almoravids based in Spain, in the 12th Century. The building is absolutely stunning and I highly recommend paying a small fee to discover this gem. Atlas Mountains The Toubkal mountain peak is in the High Atlas and is the highest mountain in Morocco at 4, m and the area is covered in snow in winter. Dangerous and Beautiful Roads These three roads are incredibly beautiful and driving them requires some skill. However, the driving is easier now that roads are getting upgraded. If you are planning a road trip to Morocco, make sure some of the beautiful and dangerous roads are on your itinerary, and you will create lasting memories. Alongside the Spanish Enclaves , they make for good travel memories. For more inspiration on Morocco, check out my Pinterest board. Please tell me about your experience in the comments below!

Babies of beautiful dangerous wild animals. You might be amazed to note that these animals and plants are as dangerous as they as they can look. The small creatures such as scrubs, mites and ticks are just some of the friendly dangerous animals and insects someone can ever think of while out there in the jungle of the rainforest. These small plants and insects big animals and small animals can cause just as many problems if not more than their bigger rivals. It is therefore advisable while you are in the dangerous rainforest to use a groundsheet if planning on sitting down in the rainforest for your safari animal research or just for pleasure. With plenty of places to hide and hitchhike while in the rainforest, you might just be amazed to the extent of which animals big and small in the rainforest have managed to adopt themselves to the different conditions and for their entire survival as well. Most of the time juvenile scrub-itch mites like to attach themselves in skin folds as these areas is constricted by clothing, such as waistbands. You might be amazed to note that such dangerous insects and mites can be as harmful and dangerous if care and protection from such dangerous insects and creatures is not given a priority. On the other hand the adult scrub ticks are a more serious matter though. What is the best way to prevent getting stung or bitten with mites and ticks is that the best way is by avoiding walking and camping in areas with thick undergrowth the chances of getting bitten are greatly reduced. While it might be difficult to know what has bitten you while you are out there in the rainforest with many creatures and plants brushing your skin and crossing paths with you, the symptoms of a bite from an insect would include an itchy, raised crater like swelling. This could be followed by a headache and numbness or pain in the affected area. The best solution is not to panic or ignore what has bitten you or what creature has sting you. If you see what insect had stung you, you defiantly have a better change of getting the correct medication for the correct sting or insect bite. In order to prevent any more insect bites or getting stung, in order to kill the tick apply insecticide or alcohol. There are many cases where spiders have known to kill people if the person stung by a spider did not get proper medical attention. The emperor scorpion are just some of the most dangerous insects in the world and care has to be taken in order to prevent such insects from attacking. On the other hand, as most insects, animals and plant species are harmless though the simplest thing to do is leave them alone and they will do the same to you. Dangerous creepy Leeches These secretive dangerous creatures are found throughout the rainforest, leeches are a great annoyance to bushwalkers. These creepy creatures are just perfect at climbing to people without even knowing. People are not aware about leeches until it has fed on blood and you feel the itch. The other way of keeping these dangerous creatures from attacking you is by simply applying insect repellent before embarking on your trip over your shoes and socks should deter leeches. The best way to remove leeches are simply using a flame. Cutting down a leech will just create more excruciating pain to you and a great discomfort as well. The best way to remove these dangerous creepy leeches is by exposing them to a flame or sprinkling them with salt or alcohol. Dangerous poisonous vipers and lethal Snakes There are no creatures that are most feared other than snakes. These dangerous beautiful creatures have had both good myth and bad myth about snakes. With the different sizes of snakes and species from different parts of the world, snakes are some of the living dangerous creatures that have one of the worst reputations. Out there in the wilderness and in the rainforest you find that the majority of snakes are harmless. These beautiful creatures are as timid as they can be and as dangerous when they are under attack or are surprised or being in danger. The best way to avoid snake bites or dangerous encounters with snakes is to read about snakes that are found within that natural habitat. If you are in the jungle and bitten by a snake, the best way is not to panic and one of the best things to do is to see if you can recognize the snake which has bitten you. You will have to concentrate on the area where you have been bitten by a snake and immediately apply a tight, broad pressure bandage. You should always try to keep the limb immobile and seek medical attention. Moving around or trying to run for help will just speed up the venom to flow and reach your hear even faster and thereby decreasing your chances of survival. If possible to gain a positive identification of the snake without endangering other people, this will assist the medical officers to provide appropriate treatment.

Cassowaries The cassowaries are some of the most important animals in the rainforest. The Cassowary with its huge size and large toenails is quite capable of causing serious injuries which can be fatal to humans. While you are out therein the jungles of the rainforest or just in the wilderness and you encounter one try to slip behind a tree or rock. People should always leave wild animals to fend for themselves. Unless these beautiful creatures are in captivity and are at the mercy of their care giver you should not feed them either, they are a wild animal and feeding them encourages human contact. This can lead to problems in the future if they become dependant on humans for food.

Stinging Tree There are a few plants in the rainforest and the stinging tree Gympie-Gympie is definitely one of them. It is normally found along tracks and clearings, especially on red soil. It has fine poisonous hairs on its heart-shaped leaves that penetrate the skin and cause severe irritation. The fine hairs can cause renewed pain up to two months after the initial sting. The easiest way to remove the hairs is by using depilatory wax, adhesive tape, or shaving. You can also try flooding the area with diluted acid, then washing.

Tree Sap Sap from some plants can cause skin irritations. It is therefore important not to pull foliage off plants. As well as being damaging to the environment you may get sap on you skin. If you do become caught simply remove the barbs in the opposite direction to which they attached themselves.

Rainforest Fruits Although they may look tempting, you should resist the temptation to eat rainforest fruits. Fruits and seed that are eaten by native birds and animals may be dangerous to humans.

Plot[ edit ] Lina Gina Lollobrigida is an orphan, brought up by her adopted mother who trains her for music. Her mother becomes sick due to a heart attack on the stage, and Lina goes to the stage in place of her mother. From the balcony, the prince of Russia, Sergio Vittorio Gassman comes down and makes the teaser group leave the theater and asks Lina to perform. It was a very good performance, but at the end, she finds out that her mother had another attack, and has been sent to the long distance hospital. By the night she wants to go, but there is no way to. Sergio offers her lift to the hospital, and on the way, they get to know each other. The prince does not tell Lina his real identity but will say only that he came there for horse competition in the local club, and he stays regularly in Paris and he is from Russia. After reaching the hospital, she leaves her handbag in the coach. Sergio puts money and his golden ring in the bag and gives it to Lina. She hurries into the hospital and discovers her mother has died. Next, she enters the horse riding club and finds out Sergio stood first in the competition. She also discovers that he is the prince. She returns the money and the ring back to him, but he says that he will take all the things in Paris. Let her come to Paris, and becoming a very famous singer, and he will find her out! With the dream she goes back to her music school in Rome and asks for the best teacher, she is ready to pay anything. They recommend Doria Robert Alda who trains her and brings her to Paris. Doria is in love with Lina, but Lina is in love with Sergio. She refuses Doria and leaves him. She struggles to get a chance and finally settles down to some extent with Carmela Anne Vernon. One of the singers is jealous of her and finally is fired from the opera for her. They fight, and after seeing this one of the members gets the idea to make a live show of shored fighting in between the two ladies to earn money. Lina owns the competition, and there a famous music director Silvani Mario Del Monaco meets her and invites her to the theater. One day Doria comes and expresses his love for her again, but she refuses. Before a stage show one day, she notices in the balcony the prince is there. At the end of the show, she expects a bouquet of flower from the prince, but nothing is there. Silvani comes and invites both the friends for a party at his house. As they agree to go, suddenly the representative of the Prince comes and sends the message that the prince has arranged a party in the honour of Lina. She accepts the offer and finally meets the prince. In an intimate situation, the Prince is trying to say something to Lina, but she is not in the mood to listen. Suddenly the friends of the prince knock on the door, and overhearing the words from them, Lina misunderstands the Prince and thinks that he is going to marry somebody else in Russia. She leaves him, and leaves Paris for an unknown place. In a village side nearby Paris, Lina, Carmela stay together and Silvani comes to teach her extensive lessons on opera music. One day, before leaving to Paris, Silvani says that he loves Lina, and she need not to answer him right then. If at all, any time in life she feels for him, he is there for her. Silvani, in Paris meets an opera whose music director was Doria, where they will arrange for Lina to sing. Again her name will spread like anything; Doria becomes jealous of Silvani. In between the show, one day Sergio comes and meets Lina in the dressing room. Lina refuses him, because of her misconception of the prince and in front of Silvani says that she will marry him after the show. Doria appoints somebody to kill Silvani during the scene of a firing squad. So now for him, the road is clear, he will take her to a stage show in a different part of the world. Finally, an invitation comes from the Tsar of Russia. On the way to Russia, due to snowfall, the train halts for two hours, and there Sergio meets her again. But this time she accuses him of the murder of Silvani. Extremely insulted, Sergio leaves. During the meeting with the Tsar and his wife, Lina sees Sergio, and she says that she wants to sing the new opera Tusca, the last performance with Silvani. Doria objects, but the Quinn shows her interest for that. During the performance, Doria is over tensed, because last time he arranged the murder of Silvani; Lina is doing extremely well because she is emotionally charged and the Prince Sergio feels disgusted because he thinks that Lina is creating pressure on him unnecessarily. He admits to Lina that it was he, who plotted the murder of Silvani out of jealousy. Finally, Lina goes back to the Prince and both of them walk away.
