Although the post-war years proved lucrative for the Ford motor company, [8] Larkin was raised in relative poverty in the largest area of council housing in the United Kingdom, in the suburbs that surrounded the Ford plant. The Becontree estate in Dagenham began as a conglomeration of 27, "homes for heroes", and had no recognisable town centre. Larkin spent much of his early childhood attending the travelling fair where his father, who worked by day as a plumber for the council, moonlighted on the waltzers to make ends meet. It was in the fairground, against a background of Little Richard on the wind-up 78 rpm turntables, that Larkin acquired his passion for the world of popular music, [9] and a taste for exotic pattern and vivid colour, which would re-surface in later years in books on Islamic art and architecture, and oriental rugs. In the s Larkin attended the South East Essex County Technical High School following which, under his own initiative he obtained an apprenticeship as a commercial artist, enabling him to take a sandwich course at the London College of Printing now the London College of Communication. There he studied typography and book design. Art and publishing[edit] Larkin began his working life in commercial art, advertising studios and design groups and for the book publisher Pearson Longmans. In he began writing for music journals and magazines. At Longmans he became senior book designer, but he soon tired of working for the publishing house and by had co-founded his own book publishing company, Scorpion Publishing. From the outset Larkin was intent upon reaching areas of the book reading public that other publishers felt it unnecessary or unprofitable to reach. Scorpion Publishing published art books on Oriental carpets and Islamic Art. His passion for an encyclopedia that would do for Bob Dylan and the Beatles what the Grove Dictionary of Music and Musicians had done for more classical subjects, and moreover do it better, finally took over when in he sold his half of Scorpion Books to fund the project and founded Square One Books. He published additional music biographies including those on Graham Bond, R. In a pre-internet age, the work required to create an encyclopedia of popular music was considerable. Aided by a team of contributors, a fast-growing library of music magazines, books and the music itself, an eventual vinyl singles, vinyl albums, music biographies and 38, CDs, [16] Larkin began compiling the Encyclopedia. In the first edition of the Encyclopedia of Popular Music went into print. Rolling Stone described the work as "musical history in the making", in The Times they called it "a work of almost frightening completeness". Musician Jools Holland called it "without question the most useful reference work on popular music". Later activities[edit] Square One developed their own in-house software using 4th Dimension. This would later change its name to become the multi-media rating site and iPhone app, btoc. Larkin closed down this website in August and re-directed the content to Musopedia. From to he was the main contributor of music biographies and album reviews for Quantone Music [Quantone], an in depth music data company. US Larkin, Colin ed.
