" I firmly believe that the Encyclopedia of Playing Card Flourishes is destined to become a true classic and I do not hesitate to give this book my highest recommendation. Buy this now." -- Steve Brooks, Owner, The Magic Cafe.

Wed Jul 18, 4: Sherman, the disappearance of actual magic shops is due to one thing: If these same customers would spend a few dollars more on each item they buy, and buy them from the local magic shop, there would be lots more magic shops. Yes, you WILL have to spend more on something in order to have a magic shop within driving distance where a live person behind the counter can demonstrate new items, give good advice, and steer you in the right direction. Most magicians have simply decided that they do not wish to pay for this service. Subscribe today to Genii Magazine Guest Re: Maybe it "makes no sense whatsoever" to blame Penguin for driving magic shops out of business. That unethical behavior notwithstanding, what can we fault them for? Reasonable adults who care about this community should recognize the consequences of patronizing Penguin and other similar shops. So, for the adults who support Penguin with their dollars, shame on you, you should know better. Penguin, and other online stores with deep-discount prices, know this and prey on it. Is what Penguin does legal? Does it have drastic negative consequences for the magic community? Definately, and those with the means to educate young magicians about these consequences should make it their business to do so. We need to tell these young customers that when they pay a few extra dollars for a trick at a brick and mortar store, they actually ARE getting value for that money. I can well remember the times when, standing at my booth in the dealer room at a convention, middle-aged men would come up to my table and ask the prices of my books. When I refused to meet those prices, they simply went over to his table and purchased the book there. Then, they had the balls to approach me later at the convention and ask me to autograph the book! So, while some of the audience for Internet magic dealers are young folks, plenty of them are our friends in magic who want to save a buck. Sun Jul 22, 4: These businesses are legitimate from the point of view that they are not breaking the law. Discounters have been around as long as I can remember. In the old days they were strictly mail-order businesses. How many of you remember the magazine Magic Manuscript? It started as a newsletter for Adam Fleischers mail-order magic business, Frazees Magic Frazee is crazy, but his prices are absolutely insane! It seems to me that some of his customers were names who one might think would know better, but Adams prices were very low and hard to pass up. And he didnt sell crap: Of course that little newsletter led to the glossy color magazine with some very big names contributing and then there was mebut nothings perfect and then the buyout, ironically, by Tannens. Brick and mortar shops survived such bargain-basement discounters because they were relatively few and far between and could only reach those who subscribed to magic magazines where they ran their one-column-inch ads. These days, with the Internet, discounters dont need to advertise nearly as much and they can reach many thousandinstead of a few thousandpotential customers. So, as Richard said, the responsibility lies squarely on our the consumers shoulders as to how we distribute our magic buck.

Re: download The Encyclopedia of Playing Card Flourishes!!! Post by Dustin Stinett» Sun Jun 13, am It seems to me that Richard has said in the past that he cannot refuse to advertise any business that is legitimate.

Cardistry in general popular use today does not card magic, and generally seeks to describe the same art form that "XCM" also tries to describe. What most people call "XCM" could be more suitably classified as a sub-category of Cardistry called something like "Xtreme Cardistry". Good addition, the Cardistry article. If you can add anything to Flourish as well, that be great! Thank you so much! Q1 Blogs are usually not considered reliable sources, with rare exceptions. A1 That may be true, but the gentlemen writing the blog is the the founder of decknique. I believe that makes him a reliable source. Q2 Were questions about the terms on perching. A2 I defined both of the terms and removed the questions within the page. Q3 Question about other factions of Cardistry. I changed Variety to Variants. As of now, XCM seems to be the only variant. A4 I suppose so, but for Cardistry they are almost always referred to as Display Cuts. I do believe the Jerry has written online that he erroneously named his book in terms of today, because there was no real word for flourishes as their own art form. So the book remains Encyclopedia of Playing Card Flourishes. Jerry now uses the term "XCM" to describe the non-magical use of playing cards. NOT Cardistry as cardistry is card magic. Yeah, the term manipulation gets tossed around a lot, and Im interested in the "Card Manipulation" article, however -- no one can yet define the term. Keep up the great work. Proposal rescinded by proponent before any discussion occurred. Card flourish , a very undeveloped article, should be merge into and redirected to this one, to make an overall better article. The flourish topic is simply nothing but what cardists do. Card flourish Merge proposal. The word "cardistry" has been used in very few publications, but never caught on. If you talk to most people today, search YouTube or Google for "cardistry", you will more often than note get non-magical results. It is also found that most opposed to the term "Cardistry" in a non-magical term are generally people who are supporting the "XCM" terminology and trying to disprove the "Cardistry" term for their own sake. Two VERY different things.
