Emma Anderson 7 March So here are some tips to help you get started. Two different surveys in reflected the loneliness that many immigrants experience upon moving to Germany: But nonetheless, many of us outsiders from countries of hugs and kisses do eventually end up forming tight bonds in the Bundesrepublik, or even marrying a German. Here are some tips to help you down that bumpy road. Find a hobby and join a club Germans are big fans of joining clubs, or Vereine. It could be for anything from books to sports. But getting involved in a group that regularly meets almost forces you to develop friendships with the other members over time. Take a German class - or some other class Photo: While I do know a number of expats who never get around to learning German despite living here for years, having some knowledge of the native tongue will certainly open up even more doors for you socially. Private tutors can be great, but having an additional interaction with others through a course who are in the same boat as you, so to speak, can also be a great way to make friends. The best classes for me were at the public Volkshochschule - which is also much more affordable than private courses. There the people seem to be more committed to living in Germany, rather than just passing through, meaning they were more likely to be looking for long-term friendships. And I also tended to be the only English speaker, meaning we were all forced to communicate in German. Plus many of them were in relationships with Germans, so visiting classmates at their flats helped me to further immerse myself into German social life. Expand your interests and vocabulary Photo: So instead of informing everyone about things you like from back home, ask them questions about what they like or their traditions. This arrangement means you already know your partner is interested in learning your language and meeting up regularly. Universities like Humboldt and local Goethe Institutes will often offer services to arrange these partnerships. There are also websites like TandemPartners. Having social roommates who already know the city and culture can be a great gateway to meeting even more people. Some prefer to keep their home space quiet for personal reflection and rest, not for socializing. One way to filter out non-social situations is to rule out anything defined as a Zweck-WG. And they take this seriously. I once thought house parties were an exception to this rule, but no: But coupled with the language barrier and the different norms when it comes to friendships, it is easy to feel frustrated and hopeless. So give it time.

Sulamit is the daughter of German-Jewish refugees. Friedrich is the son of German-Nazis refugees. Both children are closely friends as times goes by between the fall of Peron's Government in and the years of prison, torture and death in Argentina since to

A normal friend wants to immediately hear your entire history. A German friend wants to look at you suspiciously then slowly get to know you. Germans are not open books. They can initially come off as a little humorless and somewhat suspicious, particularly to overly gregarious Americans. As I got to know some of my coworkers better, my impression changed radically. After I took the time to get to know people slowly, I learned that the friendship was worth the wait. A few liters of pils also helps this process along. Bluntness has its place. A normal friend will brag about their extended weekend at an all-inclusive resort in the Bahamas. I flew standby out of Germany on August 1st once, and it was a huge mistake. Everyone was off for a month of vacation, and all the flights were booked solid for days. In Germany, people cherish traveling with family and friends. They actually use their vacation benefits and return to work weeks later energized from it. A normal friend will lend you their latest diet book. A German friend will talk to you about the American obesity crisis with a cigarette in one hand. Germans and Americans have very different ideas about health. Americans, particularly those in the northeast and west, tend to abhor cigarettes, while smoking is much more accepted in Germany. Americans eat more and poorer-quality food and get much less exercise than Germans, and regulations on soda sizes and trans fats are hotly debated as limitations on personal freedom. These cultural proclivities shape views about healthy lifestyles in interesting, mutually biased ways. A normal friend will wish you a quick happy birthday on Facebook. A German friend will be expecting a cake "€" from you on your birthday. On my 24th birthday in Leipzig, I was scrambling to finish up some final lab work before I left for Ethiopia for two months. I barricaded myself in the windowless DNA extraction room all day, hoping to fly under the radar. When shall we meet for cake? After another long, uncomfortable pause, I capitulated. German cakes are damn good, though, and getting to cash in on all the other birthday cakes throughout the year was pretty awesome. A German friend might ask you: She and her husband were both genetics researchers, but their salaries were not nearly enough to live off of in Boston, and so they were returning home soon after the baby was born. In Germany, parents are very well supported in their efforts to start families. Winters in Leipzig are similar to those in Boston "€" cold, snowy, and by February, pretty bleak. In Leipzig, however, the bad weather is made a little more bearable by outdoor activities. Restaurants keep their outdoor areas open as long as possible and use heaters and blankets to entice customers outside. From roughly November to January, you can find a Weihnachtsmarkt in most cities. It sure beats my method of surviving winter back home: A German friend knows that the best parties happen in unlikely places. I was pretty skeptical about many things when I first moved to Leipzig, and the nightlife was no exception. The tiny, dim room housed a small bar and a couple of video games, at which a few angsty-looking youths lounged apathetically. We opened it and climbed down rickety stairs to a tiny, windowless concrete basement. The DJ was setting up atop an unfinished plywood loft, and a few grimy couches slumped underneath the structure. Over the next half hour, the dank, empty little room filled with people, the dimming lights camouflaged the concrete and shitty furniture, and the music began to pulse through the small, acoustically ideal space. A German friend will tell you to stop clutching your pearls about everything. I find German straightforwardness about these issues to be refreshing. Many events in Germany involved both beer and families, including small children. Naked bodies are neither deified nor shamed. If parents want to have kids, they choose when and how. But the more we travel and meet new people, the more we learn how big the world is. America certainly does not equal normal, because there is no such thing.
