

Chapter 1 : GHOST IN THE NOONDAY SUN - STARBURST Magazine

Ghost in the Noonday Sun is a British comedy film directed by Peter Medak starring Peter Sellers, Anthony Franciosa and Spike calendrierdelascience.com film suffered a difficult production due to Sellers's erratic behavior and was not theatrically released.

Development[edit] The novel Ghost in the Noonday Sun was published in The New York Times called it a "rollicking tale". He had classical comedy genius. But we got to work on it and turned it into a crazy comedy. You could call it "Goons at Sea". Milligan looked at the rushes and said "this is on a disaster course". He outlined his ideas to Medak and Sellers, who approved. But Sellers did not turn up for the first day of filming the new scenes, claiming he was too ill to work. He decided a vase in his Swiss home might be facing the wrong way so he sent his secretary to Gstaadt to take the vase back to London. Once this was done, Sellers agreed to resume shooting. Medak shot film around Sellers. Milligan was reluctant so Sellers tried to get production shut down. On one occasion he was rushed to hospital with a suspected heart attack, only for Medak to spot newspaper photographs of Sellers dining with Princess Margaret in London two days later. Sellers also fought on set with co-star Tony Franciosa. He was depressed in real life, like the typical comedian who under the surface is suicidal He was incredibly manipulative. He destroyed the whole film On a good day he was sensational but his moods changed. But I remember, working with him, there were moments when it was heaven. We laughed so hard the tears rolled down our cheeks. Columbia Pictures deemed the film not worthy of cinematic release. The film was released on DVD in The Ghost of Peter Sellers[edit] In , it was announced that Peter Medak was directing a feature-length documentary about the ill-fated production, called The Ghost of Peter Sellers.
