She went the extra mile to investigate county records and follow up on every concern we had; she simply turned every stone! This market is extremely competitive and everything had to be handled quickly in order to stay in the game. Paige was easy to work with and made us feel like her top priority. Scheduling was a breeze, and we were always able to find time to meet with her and view homes, despite how busy she is. Once we found a home that we loved, Paige helped us to understand our options and to strategize the best approach while making an offer. She was very in tune to the sellers position each step of the way and helped to get us the best deal. Through several unexpected challenges outside of our control , Paige showed her expertise at staying ahead of the game and guiding us through each obstacle to ensure that the deal went smoothly and in our favor. Now, after finally owning our first home, we feel lucky to have found Paige when we did. She had our backs the entire time. We landed an amazing deal and we could not have gotten here without her. I highly recommend Paige Schulte! From the moment we discussed placing our home on the market she came prepared and very knowledgeable! She assisted us with staging and deep cleaning our home as well as our roof! Thuy Christina Ta New Homeowners We had planned purchasing a condo from far away, like over two thousand miles, without knowing much about Bremerton and not even been there once. After reading great comments about Paige and a brief conversation with her and we realized that she was the one. She helped us from A to Z, and we meant from A to Z. We closed it a record time within two 2 weeks, not mentioning about our special situation that we were not physically in town for showing. She showed the condo s via. Now we have a dream condo. We have put our trust in the right hands and cannot ask for more. Thank you for such professional work, Paige. When I inquired about an area other than Gig Harbor, she immediately put me in touch with a broker familiar with that area, and when I signed a contract on a house in that area, she congratulated me with no trace of any resentment, unlike some other brokers. When that contract fell through she picked up where we left off and began searching diligently. She is attentive and considerate, but she can also be aggressive when situations called for. In the end I chose not to fly over to see the house in person because I trusted her enough to decide on the purchase of the house. In addition to my impression of her work ethic, I also learned from our communication that she is very much involved with the improvement of the school system in the community. I think anybody who cares so much about her community is a good person to do business with. Join me weekly to read about the Gig Harbor community, discover local business owners, get your real estate, buying, and selling questions answered, and learn all the things to love about Gig Harbor!

Share Job fairs have always struck terror into my heart, what with the misery of air travel, the bad food, and the strange hotels. I can never seem to find my way without getting lost in the badlands of places unknown perhaps my wife is right and I should learn how to read a map. But personal feelings of dread aside, job fairs can be a good method of finding new candidates and a valuable part of an effective recruiting program. There are only two catches: You need to follow some simple guidelines that will maximize your success. If you can accept these simple realities, you are on your way to achieving results. If you wish to be successful in the utilization of job fairs success defined as making one or two offers, with three being even better , you must never, ever do the following: Go to the job fair alone Shake hands with a thousand people Listen to stories Collect resumes Return to your office, toss the resumes on the desks of the hiring managers, and follow up in a month. This is a surefire way to see that no offers are made and that you have wasted your time and money. Fortunately, if you are looking to towards the greatest possibility of being successful with your job fair, there are only three things for you to do: Plan, execute, and follow-up. You must, however, do them well. If you do them with great care and attention to detail, you will probably be more successful than you have ever been in previous job fairs. I once hired six people at a job fair. The waters parted and the angels sang. Planning Choose the right job fair. Good planning for the wrong job fair is of no value so do your homework. Spend a bit of money on a print advertisement. Tell the world about the job fair and that you will be there. Mention the positions you are looking to fill and reference your website for further information. By the way, print advertising is not dead! Ship all of your collateral and set up materials one week before the job fair begins. It cost less money to do this as opposed to overnight shipping, and you can confirm by phone that it has arrived. Ever do a job fair and the materials never made it to the hotel? Not a good thing! Make all of the hiring managers aware of the job fair. Be upbeat about the prospect of being successful. Bribe a hiring manager to come along. A strong, conversant, engaging hiring manager is essential to the success of a job fair because they can meet the candidates you feel are interesting, qualify candidates right on the spot, and even use a cell phone to set up interviews back at the office. Regardless of what anyone tells you, a hiring manager engaging a live candidate for ten minutes is better than that same hiring manager just looking through a pile of resumes. I had two hiring managers at the job fair with me the time I hired my six candidates. Execution Arrive at the job fair at least thirty minutes before the candidates are to be admitted. Be sure to be well-groomed and dressed appropriately. Make sure that your space is neat and clean, with all of your organizational collateral laid out for candidates to review. Having a bit of food is also a good idea. I recommend ordering a cheese platter in advance. Have an action plan. Unless the place is dead, the hiring manager should only chat with candidates who have gotten past the recruiters and are considered strong and viable candidates. The setting may be different, but the laws of interviewing still apply. Keep your questions legal and appropriate. Try to greet every candidate personally and spend a minute or two if possible. Your company may be one thousand miles away, but at the job fair, you are the company. Good PR never hurts. Have clear job descriptions of every position you are looking to fill. One technique that works very well for me: Rather than taking the time to see if the candidate fits the position by asking lots of questions, hand the candidate the position profile and ask them if they have the experience listed and the ability to do the job as outlined. They will generally tell you the truth and you can proceed from there. Have a list of candidate resumes that fall into three categories: Follow-Up I must put in a special word on follow-up. This is the area where most people falter. It is a sad situation, because you and your organization have invested so much to get to this point. Rapid follow-up is critical to reaching your ultimate objective. I urge you do the following: A Tutorial A successful recruitment plan is more than just numbers. Vacancies and recruiting budgets form the basis of recruitment plans, but employing good hiring practices can elevate them. Get a jumpstart on , by taking a look at a comprehensive tutorial on how to develop your recruitment plan. Learn More At job fairs we very often tend to promise candidates we will call them. If you promise to call a candidate, do just that. Even if you change your mind on pursuing a candidate, do not drop the candidate. Make the call and tell the candidate that you have identified candidates whose credentials and experience more closely align with your specific needs. They might not like the news, but they will understand. If you never follow up on your promise to call, that is something they will not understand. Many people believe that the big eat the small. That is not necessarily true. The fast eat the slow. If you are interested in a candidate, chances are that others are as well. Get the candidate in for an interview as soon as humanly possible. Do not allow any system or organizational piece of bureaucracy to slow you down. Excuses do not make hires. Fast and intelligent action makes hires. Get back to all candidates as soon as possible on the status of their candidacy as it relates to the position for which they have interviewed. That does not mean that you send a postcard eight weeks after they were interviewed. If there is no interest, call the candidate after the interview. I would never consider sending something in the mail. It is tacky to hide behind paperwork. Candidates will appreciate the personal touch, and both you as well as your company will stand out from the crowd. Provide feedback to the organization that runs the job fair and let them know where they can do better the next time. They want and need your suggestions; they will not be successful if you are not successful.

Its gray skies contrasting with stunning architecture and a truly metropolitan vibe draw visitors from all around the globe. Whether you like great food, shopping or surrounding yourself by greenery in one of the many parks, London has something for everyone. London is a great city and as a local I believe I can give you a good idea of what you could do on your visit to the capital of Great Britain. Top Attractions in London The standard tourist trail in London has been very well carved out. Some of them are close together so you could easily combine some in a few hours, up to a day, depending on how much time you spend around each location. Some of them have an official function and are therefore closed to the public, while others are open to visitors, so you could spend a lot more time there. Unfortunately for tourists visiting in the near future, the Big Ben is undergoing repair works and is expected to be covered in scaffolding until This is where many royal weddings have taken place, so if you love the monarchy, you should definitely visit the inside of Westminster Abbey. It was constructed in celebration of the new millennium and opened on December 31st, Since then it has been one of the main London attractions. Over a hundred years old, the bridge had to allow ships to sail into the busy river Thames. It is therefore that this suspension bridge was built, with the upper walkways supporting its structure. There is the option to visit the interior of the towers and the walkways, which is something I highly recommend. If you time your visit well, you can see the bridge open from above to let ships pass through! The main market hall is a wonderful building where you should definitely spend some time walking around admiring the structure. When you find yourself here, you really feel the vibe of a big city. Traffic is buzzing around you and there are always lots of crowds. But then there is also a fountain with a small statue of Anteros, which is much older than the large billboards, giving the place just that extra bit of character. In Holland Park you can find the beautiful Kyoto Garden, which probably looks its best when the trees change color during the fall. Additionally, peacocks roam around freely in Holland Park, which is quite a unique experience! Borough Market is an amazing food market located close to London Bridge. In Camden Town you can find the more alternative markets, but there is lots of street food on offer as well. Then finally another popular street market is the one in Portobello Road. Roughly located between Notting Hill Gate and Ladbroke Grove Underground stations, this market is basically just a long street market offering anything from antiques to vegetables. You can find some great souvenirs here! London has a few of these viewpoints, some more commonly known than others, some free and some come with a price tag. Two great free viewpoints are Primrose Hill and Tate Modern. This is a great place for a picnic if you get lucky with the weather. Otherwise you should head over to Tate Modern where you can take the lift up to the tenth floor to get a great view. As museums are free in London, there is no entry fee. If you would only do one of these, I would choose the London Eye out of these two. But if you like the view from much higher up, the Shard is a great option too. Gourmet Burger Kitchen – where to eat in London guide Whatever you do, make sure you eat at a pub at least once when visiting London! Pubs are everywhere, but they can get crowded. Typically British is also the Sunday roast, which is easily found in pubs around the country. Expect roast meat, potatoes, vegetables and Yorkshire puddings. Delicious foods and amazing environment! In London space comes at a cost and therefore most hotel rooms are very small. If you would like to save a bit on accommodation you could consider staying outside of central London and using public transport. Airbnb might be a good option if you would also like to look for accommodation outside of central London. London is a great city for walking and these maps are super handy to find your way around. Mind your belongings, London is a big city so there will be pickpockets. Navigating large cities is all about using your common sense. Use an oyster card to pay for public transport, it always works out cheaper than a single or day ticket. You will need to pay a deposit of 5 pounds when getting your oyster card, but you can get this money back if you return the card when you no longer need it. Oyster cards can be bought at the ticket machine in your closest underground station, there is always a member of staff around to help. At rush hour 8 – 9 am and 5 – 7 pm public transport is extremely crowded, you might want to travel outside these hours. Rianne is from the Netherlands, but currently lives in London for her studies. She loves travel and she is proud to call herself a feminist. She blogs about this and her journey of self-development at Sunny Journeys , where she hopes to inspire women to be strong and live their dreams.
