The International Book of Days is a unique record of world history. For each of the days of the year, including February 29, several substantial essays explore significant events through their anniversaries or through other relevant dates.

By Elyse Sommer Dublin, Missouri -- a prosperous town on the cusp of a new millenium so concludes the choral introduction to a seemingly idyllic modern day Our Town. The hoopla surrounding the film stars cast in Burn This our review made it necessary to stage it away from its home in a larger theater where the steady demand for tickets has extended its run with a second cast. The program for Book of Days lists only the names of the author and his longtime collaborator, director Marshall W. Mason in big letters. The cast consists of twelve seasoned actors, none of them with big box office star power, all giving terrific performances. Book of Days, like Burn This, uses a fatal accident as the device to create its dramatic complications. Its opening feels like a page from Our Town, with the whole company acting as stage manager-narrators presenting Dublin, Missouri as another Grovers Corners, a town bathed in summer sunshine and the nostalgic pleasures associated with small town life. But whatever holes you may poke into the details of the mystery and despite the sketchiness of some of the characters, Book of Days is an absorbing drama. The journal-like day-by-day chronicling of events which gives the play its title works well. The very dark vision of the powerful second act is unfortunately all too believable. Mason has staged of what sounds like a realistic, kitchen-sink play, with expressionistic flair. The twelve representative citizens move around the deceptively bare bones set by John Lee Beatty who, though best known for his drop-dead realistic scenic designs, is also an expert abstractionist. Middleton, a one-time Broadway director reduced to community theater gigs by Hollywood politics and a scandal a rather obvious contrivance discovers that stars are everywhere. By staging Saint Joan, Middleton is, if not the stranger riding into town to save it from its baser self, the facilitator. Others stepping into the spotlight from the choral ensemble are the cheese manufacturer Bates; his church-going wife Sharon Nancy Snyder , who at fifty-two is still easy to picture as the prettiest girl in high school, their son James Alan Campbell who has less interest in cheese than cheesy politics and whose Christian piety has not prevented him from cheating on his wife LouAnn Hope Chernov. Other townsfolk, all most suitably dressed by Laura Crow, include: As some of the characters provide richer performance opportunities so does some of what happens between those characters.
