Masterpiece is best known for presenting adaptations of novels and biographies , but it also shows original television dramas. The theme music played during the opening credits is the Fanfare-Rondeau from Suite of Symphonies for brass, strings and timpani No. The theme was performed by Collegium Musicum de Paris. Roland Douatte was the conductor. It was recorded in by Vogue Records in Paris, France, and was later remastered in stereo and re-released by Nonesuch records in the s. During the first seasons in the s, the theme music accompanied varying closeup shots of a waving British flag, which panned out into a still image of a British flag on a staff serving as the P in "Masterpiece". In the late s, the opening video switched to views of antique books and other literary artifacts, many of which titles had been dramatized on the program. In , Masterpiece gained a sister series, Mystery! In , to commemorate the 30th anniversary of the show, it presented Masterpiece: In looking for an underwriter for the series, Calderwood eventually met with Herb Schmertz of Mobil Corporation. The working title for the series had been The Best of the BBC, which was changed to Masterpiece Theatre before the first broadcast, with Sarson insisting upon the British spelling for Theatre. From to , it was broadcast without a host. The original series producer was Sarson. He was succeeded in by Wilson. The Trust gives donors the opportunity to support their local PBS station and also "secure the future of superb British drama I also have to raise money. In , the word "Theatre" was dropped, and the show, officially known as Masterpiece, was split into three different sections. Masterpiece Classic was initially hosted by Gillian Anderson ; [12] the following year, Laura Linney took her place. All three versions received their own opening sequences and theme music with a common signature based upon the First Suite in D by Mouret [10] originally chosen by Sarson, who had heard it played at a Club Med resort in Sicily, because it sounded "British and heraldic". The countdown special was based on more than 20, survey responses posted to the Masterpiece and PBS affiliate websites, the top 12 series were:

The Impala was at the top, the Bel Air in the middle replacing the old trim level, and the Biscayne at the bottom in place of the line. Most Biscaynes were the cannon fodder that supported taxi cab fleets, municipalities, government agencies, and any other large group that needed cars they could get cheap and literally run into the ground. And when their usefulness was at an end and a fresh fleet of budget line vehicles ordered, they met their end as either used cars, parts donors or they were crushed into scrap metal. I wanted something that would stand out and thought a two-door Biscayne would be perfect. It also had all its original trim parts and pieces. The stock interior had been removed and everything recovered in rolled and pleated vinyl. In all, it was a good driver that gave Ellard the foundation he wanted to build a cool cruiser. Once the car arrived in his driveway, Ellard started looking everything over and figuring out what needed to be done. So, a repaint was in order. The custom vinyl interior had a very dated look, so it was earmarked for replacement. The ZZ4 engine ran good but also lacked an element of polish. First up was the paint. It was expected to only take two or three months, but after some scuffing to prep for fresh primer, some rust bubbles were found in the rear wheelwell areas. Using aircraft stripper, he took these areas down to bare metal so the rust could be repaired properly. The rest of the car was scuffed, and once the body repairs were complete, primed then repainted in Viper Red. A call to San Jacinto, Texas-based mobile interior craftsman Charles Powell got the Biscayne the necessary interior trappings to match its fresh hue. The original bench seat was recovered in red leather, along with the rear seats and door panels. A custom center console was built to hold the stereo and a pair of cupholders. For sprucing up the engine, Ellard first pulled the factory cam and replaced it with a Comp Cams Mutha Thumpr bumpstick. He also added a vacuum pump to help keep the power brakes working properly, an Edelbrock Air Gap intake with Endurashine treatment, along with an Endurashine-treated carb. The accessory drive was chromed up and polished as well. The old drum brakes were replaced with discs, and the factory Panhard bar was also ditched in favor of a tubular, Heim-joint-equipped unit. To lower the car a bit, Ellard fitted cut-down Camaro coil springs.
