Solving the Problem: Stapleton House Pine Street Inn's Stapleton House offers permanent, supportive housing for 11 formerly homeless men. All of these men had lived on the streets for years and some even for decades.

Downie, who runs Pine Street, warned her board it would be a hard-to-stomach decision, one that would involve closing some shelters and shifting those resources to instead buy homes. What Downie saw years ago was buried in a trove of data she scoured: The truth is that most people who come through Pine Street are there because of a temporary crisis. They often just need a place to stay for a few days. But Downie began to imagine what would happen if Pine Street focused on that 5 percent — the people who live on the street for months or years. Advertisement Few people thought her idea would work. A year after moving into a Pine Street home — where they also receive counseling — 96 percent of the chronically homeless are still there. It actually came from New York. Our city has about chronically homeless, down from about in Advertisement Overall, Pine Street manages nearly permanent beds compared with about emergency beds. If not for the Mission Hill house, Paul Sullivan would be in and out of shelters. He had a drinking problem that left him jobless and homeless. The former insurance administrator is now sober and has lived under the same roof for five years. He has his own room, and shares a kitchen and bathroom. It feels like a home. He does volunteer work and hopes to some day get a part-time paying job. No one is saying that emergency shelters will disappear, certainly not at Pine Street. But we have a shot at making chronic homelessness a thing of the past.
