The Chance Purdue series spoofed the private eye genre, and was written with one sentence paragraphs and minimal punctuation, with chapters prefaced by quotes from the fictional pundit Monroe D. One New York Times review described his writing as "including rat-tat-tat writing in which paragraphs are seldom more than one sentence Wild, shrewd mad and unexpectedly funny. Spencer has, up until now, been published only in paperback books that demonstrated a wacky humor and an equally wacky writing style. Spencer got his style down mostly to one-sentence paragraphs. The prose hurtled along. Neither book was serious, but Mr. Spencer had fun spoofing the crime genre, and he did so with unusual expertise. He helped me with my writing and made great suggestions to improve it. That basement, at N. He gave me many autographed copies of his books, and his knowledge of history, music and many subjects was extensive. He graduated from Chaney High school in Youngstown and never attended college. The winner was chosen by a panel of judges named by the Stout fan club known as The Wolfe Pack. This award was of special interest to me because I was one of the judges. I have no real idea why I was selected to serve, as I am not a member of the Wolfe Pack and I am hardly so deluded as to think that my reputation for criminous knowledge has spread even unto the Wolfe Pack hierarchy. Maybe he wanted to do me a favor. At any rate, I was told that I should try to judge the books I received by how well they carried on the tradition of Rex Stout. The catch was that publishers were asked to nominate books, and the judges could make their selections only from those books which the publishers nominated. In a way, this made my job easier. For example, Doubleday submitted, among others, Domino, by Phyllis A. Now, some of my best friends like Phyllis A. Whitney, but a gothic set in Colorado is not my idea of a book which is in any way like anything Rex Stout wrote. What it boiled down to was that as far as I was concerned, there were only four real contenders in the group of books that I had to select from. I thought that since there were a number of other judges, there might have to a compromise. Besides, the book is a real mystery, in which the suspects are called together at the end. And the relationships among the characters are well done. My second choice, I have to admit, was more obviously based on the Wolfe books. Judging the award was an interesting experience, and I got a huge stack of free books for my shelves. Apparently the Wolfe Pack was satisfied with the work of all the judges and may be using the same panel again for the award. That will be fine with me. Or even a bad one. The one thing I learned from my experience is that there is no one to replace Rex Stout. Nero and Archie are unique. Coming soon to this blog:
