It featured Sooty, Sweep, Soo and Scampi living in an old run-down theatre by the coast. The show gave Sweep and Scampi actual voices, but kept Sooty mute. When Richard Cadell acquired the rights to Sooty, he actually destroyed the master tapes to this series as he really despised any form of Sooty done in animation form[citation needed]. Video shows[edit] Learn with Sooty was a straight-to-video series developed to make learning fun and introduce the basic skills that children really need to understand. Stage shows[edit] Sooty also had a successful number of mainly Christmas stage shows across the UK. For the first half of the tours, Matthew and Connie Creighton would present, and during the second half, while Matthew was busy writing and filming the TV shows, Connie and Spencer K. The Movie was in production. Matthew Corbett will appear in the movie, Cadell has confirmed. It is planned for release sometime in the near future. Later annuals were published by Purnell and Sons. The annuals feature an expanded cast of characters including: Sooty, who is shown as white not yellow and wears red trousers. Sweep, also white not grey, who walks on all fours like a normal dog, but can stand as a biped to play the bugle and so on. Calico Joe, a fully clothed cat who smokes, always stands erect as a biped, and is a con man. Discography[edit] In a single and album were released. The album was Around the World with Sooty Harry Corbett and Sweep. This comprised eight songs with a linking story. The songs included both the A and B-sides of the single. These were released on the Music for Pleasure label. A future television broadcast of the documentary is currently being negotiated. The Sooty show had a number of celebrities from all walks of life making an appearance on the show. Most notable was Iron Maiden drummer Nicko McBrain who is a self-confessed Sooty fan and always has the puppet as a mascot on the front of his drumkit, and has occasionally donned a full size Sooty costume at shows as an entrance. Soo and Kipper the Cat also make cameo appearances. Bobby Davro hosted a Sooty parody sketch called "Sooty In Soho" on his sketch show in , which saw him doing an impression of Matthew and depicting Sooty and Sweep owning a brothel. The sketch was interrupted by the real Matthew Corbett showing up and assuring the audience that the Sooty which Davro had was an imposter. He then produced the real Sooty, who promptly squirted both Davro and Matthew with his water pistol. Sooty and his co star Sweep appeared on the shoulders of Peter Kay as he ran down a corridor. It is available to view on YouTube. Sweep made his first appearance on Channel Four as himself in the 8th episode of the 2nd series of The Harry Hill Show. Examples of this includes the episode where Sooty, Sweep et al. This featured Sooty and friends on various instruments playing alongside Musical Director Alan Braden and his band. The Sooty Show would close with a rousing performance from the band. A large number of shows ended with or contained a song relating in some way to the episode, although over the years a number of songs were repeated and quickly became classics - the most famous being "Battle Of The Drums" and "Home Is Where the Heart Is. The Doug Anthony Allstars wrote a song describing Sooty as a skinhead. The park has since closed. The original Sooty now resides in the northern UK village of Brancepeth near Durham , with Charlotte Lonsdale who also owns a more recent version of the puppet. The action of many episodes of Sooty and Co. The set was possibly used as an exterior location because Sooty and Co.

This Entry looks at how one bear named Sooty came to fame. He was browsing the seaside shops that graced The North Pier in Blackpool , when he came across a yellow hand puppet in the form of a bear. You can imagine what it was like having a dad who wanted to keep you amused all the time. However, this time he would also be accompanied by Teddy, who although being shy and only communicating by whispering into the ears of his presenter, was also mischievous and got up to tricks like squirting people with a water guns, hitting things with hammers, throwing custard pies, using a magic wand and playing the xylophone and organ. As television was in black and white only at that time it was felt necessary for Teddy to undergo a slight transformation making his features more distinguishable. Some soot was added to his ears and from then on Teddy was re-named Sooty. The double act was such a huge success that they became a regular feature on the television programme Saturday Special and they made many more stage performances. Before long it was felt that the bear deserved his own programme called the Sooty Show which first aired on the BBC in 1960. During the award ceremony Sooty decided that he would use his water pistol to squirt Prince Phillip , which caused the Queen to laugh. Instead I swung round and let Prince Philip have it - straight in the face! The Queen really howled with laughter. However, it was Soo, a sensible, audible talking black and white Panda puppet, that swept Sooty off his paws and has stayed with him longer than many other puppets. Keeping it in the Family In 1961, Harry suffered a heart attack and it was deemed necessary for a temporary replacement to be found. Matthew bought the rights to the Sooty Company but when his father became well again and tried to return to Sooty a row ensued. In the end a compromise was made where by Harry would do some live shows with Sooty and Matthew would do the televised work. The last shows to be undertaken by Harry and his wife Marjorie took place in Weymouth, Dorset. Harry died in 1962. Matthew continued gracing the television screens with Sooty but sold the rights to Hit Entertainment in 1963. In the show faced criticism from the ITC Television Watchdog company as it featured a sketch that showed the cast sniffing bottles and the presenter swallowing a pill. The ITC said it was unwise to show this sketch to children for fear that they may try sniffing various bottles and taking pills. That same year, Britt Allcroft and Sooty International Limited collaborated to create Bridgefilms and soon started making plans to market Sooty worldwide through cartoon strips, videos, toys and books. Sooty had already been viewed in Australia, South Africa and New Zealand but it was felt that he should seek out audiences in America and the rest of Europe too. The sale went through for around a million pounds. In an interview with the BBC he explained why he thought Sooty had lasted for sixty years. When it was noted that the sale had gone through it was purported that Richard would be working closely with Sooty on creating future television series and stage productions. So fans watch this space.

Chapter 3 : Matthew Corbett

The Secret of Sooty Wick Inn is a well written page-turner that's so much more than juvenile fiction. It defies categories and appeals to readers of all ages, especially adults looking for a fascinating summer read.

This Entry looks at how a bear named Sooty came to fame. He was browsing the seaside shops that graced the North Pier in Blackpool when he came across a yellow hand puppet in the form of a bear. He bought it for 7s 6d 1 and soon started entertaining his two sons with the puppet, whom he affectionately called Teddy. You can imagine what it was like having a dad who wanted to keep you amused all the time Teddy got up to tricks like squirting people with a water guns, hitting things with hammers, throwing custard pies, using a magic wand and playing the xylophone and organ. As television was in black and white at that time, it was felt necessary for Teddy to undergo a slight transformation, making his features more distinguishable. Some soot was added to his ears, and from then on Teddy was renamed Sooty. The double act was such a huge success it became a regular feature on the television programme Saturday Special, and they made many more stage performances, too. Before long, it was felt the bear deserved his own programme called the Sooty Show, which first aired on the BBC in 1955. During the ceremony, Sooty used his water pistol to squirt Prince Philip , which caused the Queen to laugh. Instead I swung round and let Prince Philip have it - straight in the face! The Queen really howled with laughter. It was Soo, a sensible, audible, talking black-and-white panda puppet that swept Sooty off his paws and has stayed with him longer than many others. Keeping it in the Family In , Corbett suffered a heart attack and a temporary replacement was sought. They came in the form of his son Matthew, who also entertained children in the television programme Rainbow. Matthew bought the rights to the Sooty Company, but when his father became well again and tried to return to Sooty a row ensued. In the end a compromise was made whereby Harry would do some live shows with Sooty while Matthew would do the televised work. The last shows by Harry and his wife Marjorie took place in Weymouth, Dorset. Harry died in 1970. Matthew continued to grace television screens with Sooty, but sold the rights to the show to Hit Entertainment in 1980. Matthew retired in 1985. Sooty Leaves Home Matthew recalled meeting a young puppeteer and magician called Richard Cadell on the show in 1960. In the show faced criticism from the Independent Television Commission for featuring a sketch in which the cast sniffed bottles and the presenter swallowed a pill. The ITC said it was unwise to show this sketch to children for fear that they may try sniffing various bottles and taking pills. It was now felt he should seek out audiences in the USA and rest of Europe. After presenting the Sooty Show for ten years, Cadell bought the rights to the puppets in June 1980, with financial help from his brother. In an interview with the BBC, he explained why he thought Sooty had lasted 60 years: At the time of the sale Cadell was purported to be working closely with Sooty on creating future television series and stage productions. He is, of course, Sooty! Sooty and Harry in black-and-white days! Digging around in the seaside shops for something to entertain his two sons, he discovered a yellow glove puppet. It was a must-buy and also the beginning of a legend! Sooty and Harry on the BBC in ! As Harry explains in The Secret Life of Sooty - a fascinating look at the story of this little yellow bear written by Geoff Tibballs with an introduction by none other than Sooty fan and former Beatle George Harrison - despite Sooty being bought for the kids, things soon changed: Then he was off to play with something else. But I fell in love with it! Piano-playing, magic and conjuring were all part of his repertoire, and the puppet was soon added to the list. Originally just known as Teddy, the little yellow bear was re-named after Harry added some soot from the chimney to his ears and nose. The rest, as they say, is history Along with Sweep the dog annoying or loveable? First, that was Harry Corbett and then - when Harry retired in - his son Matthew, also Bradford born and bred, took over the show for the next 22 years. Despite all the changes, this little bear still has strong roots in his adopted home city. And his fame was such that when a toy shop named after him was opened in Bradford decades ago the crowds were so big that the police had to be called! So what exactly makes Sooty so popular after all these years? Well, in a recent interview Richard Cadell explains his theory: We want to hear from you about your favourite Sooty memories as he celebrates his 60th anniversary! Do you remember him from those old black-and-white days or do you think the best was yet to come when Matthew took over? Or are your children or grandchildren enjoying watching the latest Sooty incarnation with Richard Cadell? I can remember the stained glass windows and the big Sooty statue over the door. I remember my mum buying me my first special party dress there when I was about four.
