

Chapter 1 : Rock Climb Sea Monkeys, Log Canyon

And thus, "The Ultimate Guide to Sea Monkeys" was born. Realizing there was an interest out there in Sea Monkeys that went beyond simple nostalgia, Susan set to compile her extensive knowledge and experience into one handy volume.

Many people who buy these kits feel frustrated because even though the instructions are clear, they do not answer all the doubts or questions that may arise. This is the biggest mistake people make. They see that the spoon is small and the manual says to feed once or twice a week, but they feel sorry and do not follow the golden rule! Of the many Sea-monkeys that are born, only a half dozen or so survive to adulthood. The reason is not under nourishment, but natural selection, only the strongest and fittest survive, like most species in the animal kingdom. Get a new straw to mix the formulas, most people use spoons that have been washed with soap, a big no no. This straw should be rinsed after each use and stored in a clean paper towel. If your kit has Plasma, or if you order it separately by mail highly recommended, use 12 oz of water. The Plasma is an additive that gives the formula a higher salt concentration, it also provides micro nutrients, that stimulate the growth of the young Sea-Monkeys. Get or buy a container that holds up to 16 oz of liquid to oxygenate the water at least every time you feed them. This is done by pouring the contents from one container to another a few times. Remember that Sea-Monkeys tanks dont use an air pump. Many more will survive if the water is properly oxygenated. In the first week of life, its important to oxygenate the water daily. If your kit does not include packet 4 Plasma, feed the Sea-Monkeys on the fourth day of life. I consider Plasma to be an important additive to the formula. If your kit does not include it, it is worth it to order it. If your Kit includes the Plasma packet, wait two or three days after adding the Plasma before feeding them. Even though the new Manual indicates that the Plasma should be added at ten days of life, I have found that it is too late to help the baby Sea-Monkeys survive. This is just a suggestion based on my personal experience, by no means do I assume any responsibility for any mishaps, but I can assure that following my method many more Sea-Monkeys will survive. Most probably the new instructions on the use of Plasma are due to the change in labeling that the formulas underwent a few years ago, when various distributors had control of the sale of the kits. Thanks to ExploraToy this situation is now stable. You can read about my theory on this case in the " history " section. Follow the Plasma 3 packet instructions if you have a Magic Castle or other non-standard non Micro-View container that requires the use of the Aqua-Leash to mix the formulas. Sea-Monkeys love sunny days, because they promote the growth of algae, that provides both oxygen and food. But do not make the mistake of leaving them in direct sun light, as this warms the water and is not healthy for your pets. A good idea is to provide a small amount of light, 15 watts or less, or better yet, a light bulb for plants, that does not heat the water, yet provides a constant temperature and soft light at night. That way you can separate; Newborns they need tiny particles of food which the older Sea-Monkeys eat first The sick as not to contaminate the others The "bullies" always male Pregnant Moms so the bullies wont bother them or simply to clean or change the water in tank where you keep your Sea-Monkeys. How should you clean the Sea-Monkeys water? This is done by emptying the contents from the tank to a clean container, carefully, so as to leave only a small amount of water on the bottom where all the sedimentation is found, clean the tank with some distilled water be sure to throw out the wash water, then empty the formula in the clean tank. The amount of formula that you threw out with the sediments can be replaced with some prepared "Jumbo Living Plasma". You could also prepare a small packet of Plasma, but this only makes 6 ozs.

Artemia, the only genus in the family Artemiidae, has changed little externally since the Triassic period. Artemia populations are found worldwide in inland saltwater lakes, but not in oceans. The ability of the Artemia to produce dormant eggs, known as cysts, has led to extensive use of Artemia in aquaculture. The cysts may be stored for long periods and hatched on demand to provide a convenient form of live feed for larval fish and crustaceans. Nauplii of the brine shrimp Artemia constitute the most widely used food item, and over tonnes of dry Artemia cysts are marketed worldwide annually. In addition, the resilience of Artemia makes them ideal animals for running biological toxicity assays and is now one of the standard organisms for testing the toxicity of chemicals. A breed of Artemia is sold as a novelty gift under the marketing name Sea-Monkeys. Subscribe to my RSS feed and get loads more!
