Students who choose to go to Stanford or Columbia are probably, among other things, choosing based on lifestyle and regional loyalties: How many students choose to go to Stanford in order to practice in Cleveland or Pittsburgh? How many pick Columbia with the goal of big firm practice in Dallas or Portland? Something similar is also true for Virginia, which combines both a low number of in-state students with proximity, and traditional feeder relationships, to attractive legal markets in D. Contrast these cases with Berkeley or Texas, which have very high in-state student populations, are in states with major legal markets, and, like Columbia and Stanford, tend to be chosen by many students who have distinct lifestyle preferences and regional loyalties. So the bottom line is this: Reputations die hard and are long in being born-especially among attorneys. In , the top five law schools were Harvard, Yale, and Michigan, with Columbia, Stanford, and Chicago fighting it out for the remaining two spots. Penn was just on the cusp of the "top five," Virginia was clearly top ten, and then some mix of Duke, Northwestern, Texas, and Berkeley fought it out for the remaining top ten spots. Cornell was surely top 15, NYU might have been top 15, Vanderbilt was surely top 20, and Georgetown might have been top UCLA was a brand new law school, just a half-dozen years old. Duke also benefits from a highly inflated rating-relative to faculty quality-in U. News for most of the last decade. Size matter-- at the margins. Without a doubt, two of the measures used in calculating the overall rank are sensitive to the number of graduates both JDs and LLMS , and in that category, Georgetown leads even Harvard and NYU the next two largest by a margin of more than graduates per year! If Georgetown were the size, say, of Penn, it is likely that it would rank more like Cornell in this kind of study. Notice, for example, that Georgetown is distinctly underrepresented at the most elite firms in its hometown of Washington, D. All 16 of these schools are genuinely national in their reputation and placement power. GW is on the cusp here, but its numbers are inflated by a large number of LLM graduates, and so does not deserve to be ranked with Berkeley and Cornell. Elite firm placement is only one measure of national reputation and standing. Placement in law teaching jobs, an even more selective process, is revealing. So is placement in clerkships, placement in the most sought-after public sector jobs, and so on. Rank for law teaching placement is included above, and some data on clerkships is available elsewhere on this site see Supreme Court Clerkship Placement , but systematic data on all these possible measures of national standing is not presently available.
