Purple leaf plum tree is one of those few trees, whose blooming marks the arrival of spring. The leaves appear just after the fading of the flowers. Leaves are generally shed in the month of August and by the end of September, the tree completely loses its foliage. Purple leaf plum trees bear small, deep red or purple colored fruits in July. The fruits are usually about the size of a cherry and ripen in August. They are edible, and can be eaten raw or used to make jam, depending on whether they are sweet or sour. Squirrels and birds are frequent visitors to the tree to feast on these fruits. Seeds are the unit for propagation, though you can also use vegetative parts for that purpose. How to Grow Planting Purple leaf plum tree can be grown in any soil type, though a rich loamy soil is preferred, and it should be moist and well drained. A slightly acidic soil is suitable for planting this tree, though it can be grown in other types of soil too. The place selected for growing this tree should be well exposed to sunlight. It is also important to remove the damaged and dead branches occasionally to retain the ornamental value. Watering should be done on a regular basis, but do not water the plant too often. If it gets too hot, water the tree deeply at its base. A point to note is that a young plum tree has a tendency to bend, especially after a rain. Though it does regain its former posture once the leaves have dried completely, a heavy rain can result in permanent drooping. This problem can also be solved by pruning. Though the tree is great for enhancing the look of your garden and lawn, the flowers can attract many undesirable insects. Bees will be more common during the flowering season, while the tree is also vulnerable to tent caterpillars, aphids, mealy bugs and other pests. You may also witness some diseases like gray mold, cankers and leaf spots that can diminish the beauty of the purple leaf plum tree. Therefore, make sure to take care of this tree to give an attractive and fresh look to your garden.

Print About 20 varieties dominate the commercial supply of plums , and most originated in either Asia or Europe. In spite of our stronger cultural connections with Europe when it comes to food, it is actually the Japanese plum that most people would identify as the typical American plum. Originally from China, these plums were introduced into Japan some years ago, and were eventually brought from there to the United States. Most varieties have yellow or reddish flesh that is quite juicy and skin colors that range from crimson to black-red but never purple. They are also clingstone fruits—that is, their flesh clings to the pit. In contrast, European-type plums are smaller, denser and less juicy. They are often blue or purple, and their pits are usually freestone, meaning they separate easily from the flesh. The flesh is golden-yellow. The domestic plum season extends from May through October, with Japanese types coming on the market first and peaking in August, followed by European varieties in the fall. This large, slightly flat, purple-black, amber-fleshed plum is similar to the El Dorado. This is a cross between an apricot and a plum, though it more closely resembles a plum. Some varietal names of plumcots are Plum Parfait and Flavorella. This is another hybrid, a cross between a plumcot and a plum, so though there is apricot somewhere in the mix, this fruit looks distinctly like a plum. It is also sold as Dinosaur Eggs. It has purplish skin and sweet flesh that ranges in color from amber to red. This hybrid has a long-lasting flavor.
