This Tender Prize has 10 ratings and 1 review. Sarah Mac said: Well, color me surprised. This was a fun little ripper that packed a heavy punch in a smal.

August 5, Posted in: Tenders Bids Proposals Tags: It never ceases to amaze me how many are eager to throw everything into a bid without first establishing the value of potential revenues â€” that is, the size of the prize. This is often true, even when they are incumbent service providers. Before you decide to bid, you must size up the opportunity. How to dimension the size of the prize Your answers to the following questions will be important to determining what is up for grabs. If you are incumbent or have done some work for the client in the past , do you know how much revenue the client generates? Finding out can be as simple as checking your invoices. The bills always tell the story! If you are not an incumbent, do you have any idea of the value of work on offer? Other questions that will help you determine the size of the prize: How many providers currently service this client? Who are the incumbent providers? Do you have any insight into their current charges? What panel size is envisaged after this process? Is the vendor planning to reduce the number of external service providers? Can you find out? If it is a government department, agency, authority or other entity you can often request this information. Annual reports can be a good source for government and publicly listed companies. How does this annual spend break down by category or area of expertise? How is work distributed to incumbents? Are user departments compelled to use the selected providers, or does work go off panel? If so, under what circumstances? What is the expected duration of appointment? What cross-selling opportunities will there be to expand and grow services provided to this client if you do win? By determining the size of the prize, you can better assess your prospects of success and make a sound decision on whether this particular bid, tender or proposal is the right one for an investment of your time and resources.
