Some of us come from nations that have already outright banned trapping and feel that the United States has fallen behind the rest of the world in regards to these cruel and indiscriminate devices. Many of the states that allow trapping have few, if any, restrictions on where the traps can be placed and warnings for unintended victims. Traps can be placed just a few feet from parks, commonly used pathways, private property, roads, and even in parks and recreational areas. This puts people, tourists, and pets highly at risk for falling victim to these traps. Also, while many of the states do have restrictions on how often the traps need to be checked, it is usually days. This means an animal intended victim or not can be stuck in the trap suffering, exposed to weather and other threats, and with little to no access to food and water for days. While traps usually do need to be identified even the states admit it is nearly impossible to enforce this. Seattle, WA â€” A college student stepped in a leg-hold trap while trying to free his dog from another leg-hold trap adjacent to it. Calais, ME â€” A man was walking his dog when he stepped in a steel jawed leg-hold trap. Luckily he was wearing heavy boots so he sustained no injuries but was later arrested for interfering with the trap. North Pole, Alaska â€” A 3 year old husky was stuck in a leg hold trap for an estimated weeks. During this time her weight had dropped from 60 pounds to 20 pounds. Streetsboro, OH â€” A woman was walking in a city park and stepped on a steel jawed leg-hold trap. Luckily she was wearing strong boots and suffered no injuries but needed the help of several people to free her. Lebanon, CT â€” A family cat went missing for 10 days and when he returned he was dragging a steel jawed leg-hold trap. The animal was rushed to a veterinarian and despite care, the cat lost part of its paw. Scappoose, OR â€” A woman got her hand caught in a conibrear trap near her home. She needed help from neighbors to free herself from the trap and ended up with nerve damage afterwards. She was found in the trap about 10 feet from the road. There are dozens or hundreds? In addition to this, most of these traps are designed to detain or incapacitate its victim, not kill it. As mentioned before, these animals are left to suffer for days or weeks on hand. When the trapper comes the animals suffering does not end. Trappers employ several methods to kill their prey â€” strangulation, drowning, bludgeoning, poisoning, standing on its chest so it cannot breathe, using a catch pole around its neck and hitting the victim against the ground, rocks, or trees, and so on. In most civilized nations any one of these acts to a pet or person would put the trapper in jail yet it seems that in the United States that those rights only go as far as pets and humans and those rights are ignored when it is wildlife who is the victim intended or not. People in many nations love to come to the United States for vacation and we enjoy your many wonders- national parks like Yellowstone, Yosemite, and unique ecosystems like the Florida Everglades, the Rocky Mountains, and the Great Lakes. Yet when the fear of these traps come into the consideration many people have second thoughts about coming to the USA and either shorten their trips because they do not include these attractions or do not come to the USA at all. We are urging you to ban all trapping on public and federal land. These are places designated for all to enjoy but a small percentage are making it difficult to fully enjoy them with their mechanical land mines. Why should a few people be allowed to utilize the land in a way that is so dangerous that the majority cannot enjoy it?

Merchants returning from trade missions to Overhill Cherokee villages in the Tennessee Valley brought back news of the abundance of game west of the range, and began taking hunters along on their trade expeditions. In 1761, Thomas Walker crossed the mountains and explored the Holston River valley, recording and widely publicizing the location of Cumberland Gap – a pass near the modern border of Virginia, Kentucky, and Tennessee – which allowed relatively easy access to the headwaters of the Tennessee and Cumberland rivers. The expedition, which was launched in retaliation for the Cherokee sacking of Fort Loudoun in 1761, forced the Cherokee to sign a peace treaty. In 1769, Daniel Boone, Richard Callaway and Benjamin Cutbirth explored the upper Holston Valley as agents for Richard Henderson, a land speculator who later played an important role in the early settlement of Tennessee. He built a cabin at the site around 1775. One member of the Smith expedition, Uriah Stone, was hunting along a tributary of the Cumberland when a French hunting companion stole all of his furs. The tributary was subsequently named Stones River. Although Crockett was killed, the various trails, salt licks and camping areas identified by the Boone and Callaway expeditions would later help guide the first English settlers to the Middle Tennessee area. Both the Cherokee and the British, however, had considerable difficulty enforcing this ban. In 1764, Cherokee Chief Oconastota complained to the British Superintendent of Indian Affairs that the entire Cherokee Nation was "filling with Hunters, and the guns rattling every way on the path. Walden Ridge, the eastern escarpment of the Cumberland Plateau in Tennessee, is named for Elisha Walden, one of the first English Americans to observe it. Percy Priest Lake impoundment of Stones River, in the area where Uriah Stone had his furs stolen more than years earlier. The French wanted the region to connect their holdings in Canada with New Orleans, and the British sought to establish a foothold in the Ohio Valley. The maneuvers of French commander Pierre-Joseph Celoron de Blainville in 1769 discouraged English trade west of the Appalachians, although English speculators remained interested in the region. With the fall of Fort Duquesne and the construction of Fort Pitt in 1763, however, the French were forced to evacuate the region. The French departure and a relative state of peace with the Cherokee during the same period opened up the region to English explorers and hunters. In 1769, an expedition led by James Harrod and Michael Holsteiner Michael Stoner crossed Kentucky from north-to-south, reaching the Nashville area several weeks after departing from the Illinois Country. Around the same time, an expedition led by Benjamin Cutbirth crossed Cumberland Gap and pushed all the way to the Mississippi River, where they shipped the pelts they had collected down to New Orleans. The following year, the two led an expedition into Kentucky, traveling up the Rockcastle River and establishing a station camp at Red Lick Fork. While Boone and a companion named John Stuart were hunting along the Kentucky River, they were captured by the Shawnee, and their pelts were confiscated. They returned to their station camp to find it plundered, and learned that Finley and the rest of the expedition had returned to North Carolina. Undeterred, Boone and Stuart continued hunting in the region. Boone was later joined by his brother, Squire, and the Boone brothers remained in the Kentucky wilderness until 1775. Although they again had their pelts confiscated when they were intercepted by the Cherokee at Cumberland Gap, the Boones were nevertheless eager to return to settle in the region. Legacy[ edit ] Numerous natural and political entities in Kentucky bear the names of long hunters, including Boone County and Boonesborough, named for Daniel Boone, and Harrodsburg, named for James Harrod. Kenton County is named for Simon Kenton, who, believing he was a fugitive, spent the mids hunting in eastern Kentucky.

As of , there were just fewer than 70 million million pet dogs in America and more than two-thirds of American households had a dog. Of the 10 most popular breeds in America in , half originated in Germany, three in Britain, one in Canada and one of unknown origin. Americans favor larger dogs, with European breeds making up the majority of the top 10 most popular list. Labrador Retriever The Labrador originated in Canada and takes his name from his home region. This breed is universally regarded as the ultimate family dog, great with kids, intelligent and eager to please his owner. He originally was bred for bird hunting, where his soft mouth and strong retrieving instincts ideal for bringing back felled birds. German Shepherd The German shepherd has a checkered history in America. After the World War I, his popularity waned as anti-German sentiment swelled. But starring roles for the breed in the media as Rin Tin Tin and Strongheart saw this intelligent and popularity of this protective breed grow once again. Prior to that, they were relatively rare in the country, while exceedingly popular as a game retriever in Britain. The specific origins of the beagle were never established, however the breed first became established in England during the Middle Ages. This breed loves to track scent. His adorable floppy ears help him, by trapping scent around his head while his nose is to the ground. Bulldog This quintessentially British breed loves children, has boundless affection and likes nothing better than being close to his owners. Although originally bred for bull-baiting, his fiercer traits have diminished over the generations. Yorkshire Terrier Bucking the trend of big dogs, the Yorkshire terrier might be tiny but he has a big personality. These dogs are declining in popularity, but have a dedicated army of admirers that should see them keep their place in the top 10 for years to come. Boxer Quirky, energetic, strong and loyal, the boxer makes an excellent guard dog, watch dog and assistance dog but is equally happy to chill out in front of the fire. The boxer is part of a national trend that shows Americans are beginning to increasingly favor mastiff type breeds. Poodle Another German import, this water dog is admired for his tightly curled coat and his high intelligence. Rottweiler The biggest breed in the top 10, this powerful yet affectionate dog makes a formidable guard dog. His reputation as a menace is undeserved and with proper training, he makes a loyal and trustworthy companion. Dachshund This German hound has an army of famous admirers, including John F. Kennedy, Queen Victoria and Picasso. The rising popularity of big breeds means that in , this playful and friendly breed was bumped down a place in the top 10 by his compatriot the rottweiler.
