The Trivalent form is generally used. Chrome wastes are of great concern. This results in the balance finding its way to effluents and creating environmental problems. As per an estimate for , tonnes of basic chrome sulphate were used out of which tonnes were released in the waste water streams. More than plants have been installed in the India for recovery and recycle of Chromium salts. Cleaner chrome tanning methods based on high exhaustion principles have been evolved. Closed pickle tan loop method gives a saving of about Rs. Chromium recovery can be achieved either by a direct recycling of the spent liquor by adding make up quantities. Salts and other impurities tend to accumulate and may have an adverse effect on quality of leather. Recovery of Chromium by alkaline precipitation and consequent dissolution in Sulphuric acid and a reuse of the resultant solution is an efficient methodology. The highly reactive alkalis may give a voluminous sludge. Lime may also give Calcium Sulphate which makes the reuse of chromium difficult. Using MgO as alkali is considered more appropriate for small as well as large tanneries because of ease of operation and low investment costs. Use of Chromium free tanning has also been advocated as a clean technology option. Synthetic organic tanning agents alone or in a combination with metallic cations can be considered as a substitute for chromium. Vegetable tanning has also got a high pollution potential because of the low biodegradability. Recovery of vegetable tanning floats has been used by ultrafiltration in many European countries and the recovered tannins can be used in the tanning process. Vegetable and aluminum tanning can also produce chrome free leather. Within the options of clean technology during post tanning operations, absence of chromium during retanning and not using polluting dyestuffs, benzidine dyes and halogenated oils in fat liquors are strongly advocated. The finishing processes should ideally work on water based finishes. Pigments should not contain heavy metals. With up to 40 tonnes of water being used to process 1 tonne of hide, there is a need to conserve water. Treated effluents can be also used through membrane filters to further reduce the water consumption. Utilising Solid Wastes from Tanneries: Significant amount of solid wastes are produced including trimmings, degraded hide and hair from the beam house process. Large amounts of sludges are also generated. Solid wastes can be utilized to make dog toys, gelatin etc. The salt recovered from mechanical desalting and solar evaporation pans can be used for curing and pickling or can be disposed off into the sea where feasible. Fleshing and solid sludge from primary and secondary treatment processes can be utilized to produce biogas. Tannery fleshings which are the major solid wastes emanating from the beam house can be subject to biomethanation. The fleshings are liquefied completely biologically and the resultant liquefied fleshing is treated in anaerobic reactors to produce biogas. Any anaerobic reactor like a U. The technology is being implemented at Melvisharam, Tamil Nadu. This technology developed by the Central Leather Research Institute is also used for biomethanation of slaughter house and vegetable market wastes. Sludges from the treatment plant can also be used in brick manufacture, land filling of low lying areas and also as a fertilizer given that the Chrome content meets the prescribed standards. Hair could be used in the manufacture of low priced rugs and carpets. Hair protein can be used as a supplement in animal feed. Sludge from lime pits can be used for land filling as well as construction of low priced houses. Barks and nuts from vegetable tanning could be used as fuel in boilers and brick kilns. The shavings, trimmings and buffings of vegetable and chrome tanned leather could be used in the manufacture of leather boards.

At the end Dylan Dog, the horror investigator, works out that behind a series of mysterious deaths there is a doctor who by hypnotizing his clients frees their lower, instinctive side. The doctor, confessing his guilt, declares that he did it with a good intent, to cure his clients by freeing them from inner struggles. At the same time his hypocrisy comes out as he expresses his sense of scientific triumph and his indifference to the fate of his patients.
