The Official Toshiba Support Website provides support for Satellite CS

I was going to post the links on my blog to share with you. Tim runs the site as a hobby. Also any reasonably tech-savy home user could repair their own laptop. Not terribly difficult with instructions on how to dismantle the laptop. I have a BSc in Computer Science, always built my own desktop PCs to my own specification, and have a reasonably good knowledge of electronics. Eventually found one, along with links for s of others. I wanted to share these links publicly. Many of you repair and refurbish second-hand laptops for charity and for the less fortunate. Let them know that you will avoid Toshiba products in the future, and will not recommend them to others, until they are as open with their information as are other competing companies. Perhaps in the future, with public opinion stacked in favour of open repair policies, they will change their mind. This is on top of your customer service refusing to send me a new PSU on a brand new laptop. Time for a new manual Toshiba: So how is this less risky than repairing my own laptop? Also desktop motherboard manufacturers will sell you an open printed circuit board, that has big capacitors on it that could easily injure if not handled properly. Do they get sued for this. Toshiba owns copyright on repair manuals Yes you do. You are starting to annoy me with that, really you are. There are plenty of people with the skill and knowledge to do this. The manuals are only available to Toshiba authorised service providers under strict confidentiality agreements. But, no, they want me and you to buy new ones when they break down. I think their excuses and reasoning are absolute complete and utter bullshit. I feel strongly enough about this to let the readers of my blog know also.
