Photographer takes pictures of naked - and beautiful - older women by By Lini S. In a few minutes, she will pose for photographer and artist Nancy Hellebrand – completely naked. Her body bears witness to the progression of life, of carrying and breastfeeding three children, of age spots and wrinkles and sags, of hips that creak and shoulders that hunch, and all the other travails and indignities of getting old. Some might call her body a battlefield. Hellebrand calls it beautiful. In younger women, the skin is taut. In older women, the skin is the opposite of taut – and it has its own strength. Intermittently for the last few years, and with particular focus in the last few months, Hellebrand has sought out women of a certain age to photograph nude for her "Body of Awareness" project. At her light-filled South Philadelphia studio, she has larger-than-life blow-ups of her photos – never the face, but close-ups of different areas – shaped into 3D forms that accentuate a torso with a fold of skin, a pelvis with strands of short gray hair, the sag of a knee, a wrinkled belly that looks like the swirls of an ancient tree trunk. Not so much anymore. She asks her to step to the right, and then turn toward her, all the while offering a steady stream of "incredibly beautiful"s and "perfect"s. Weisberg beams with the validation. More recently, Hellebrand began shaping her photos into the sculptural forms. Though she still explores the aging body, she has started to add pictures of women as young as their 30s. Many of the women share intimate details, about sex lives or diagnoses of horrible diseases – but, so far, no one has shared pictures of the grandkids. She posed this year for the project and allowed she had some trepidation, but when it came time to slip out of her robe, it was no big deal. She remembers a holiday present of a camera as a kid. It was just the joy – the surprise that you could take a picture that looked like something you felt. Named "Londoners at Home," it captured everyday folks in their houses, exposing what she calls "intimate beauty. We could get to know each other a little bit. She had two children, divorced, remarried. She spent a decade in Florida as part of a Sufi community that explored Islamic mysticism. Back in Philadelphia in , she began working on "Torn. Her current project exposes that most primal condition of the human existence: November 14, - 5:

Unstylish jumper-type dresses usually made of khaki or jean material Sweaters with embroidery, appliques, etc. The easiest first step is to go the monochromatic route. This means wearing one simple color, like blue, red, green, black, white, khaki, at a time. You can always experiment with textures of the same color if you need more interest. For inspiration, see our Pinterest board of exclusively monochrome outfits. Clothes for Women over 60 Take a look at fabulous women over sixty like Susan Sarandon, Diane Sawyer, Barbara Walters, and you will notice that they keep the patterns to a minimum, tending to focus more on wearing solid colors. But when you do, keep it simple and consistent. Nothing Like a Great Accessory Caroline Herrera looks fabulous in a basic suit paired with a statement necklace. One area that older women always seem to get wrong is in the accessories department. Instead of wearing your entire jewelry box every day, focus on one wearing one standout piece at a time. BUT a nice pair of trouser cut, straight leg or wide leg jeans look fabulous on older women. This will allow the jean to stretch to fit you and help to control any problem areas. Some brands to try: For those of you with a bit more of a tummy, try skinnies from brands like Old Navy and New York and Co as they have a bit higher rise which will help it sit better on your waist. Also, if you have gray hair, the dark navy color of the jeans really set off the gray in your hair. But please, for all that is fashionable and good in this world, avoid wearing denim from head to toe. The brighter the better. If you have fairer skin and are concerned about looking washed out, start with the color of your eyes. This is universally flattering! Remember when women over 60 were told to cover up? Other things to include in your wardrobe.

Two Faces or a Vase? Old or Young Lady? It was such a simple trick of the eye to learn how to see both but it felt like magic. I continue to enjoy optical illusions of all kinds because of the magic that they seem to hold within them. Rubin Vase This is one of the most famous optical illusions that exists. There are two things that you can see in this image In black you can see two faces looking directly at one another. In white, you can see an interesting curved vase. Incidentally, this image is also called the Rubin Face since you can see it either way. Which one do you see first? And of course this means that the faces which are facing each other are white faces. A Real Vase Believe it or not, this optical illusion can be seen even when the base itself is a real vase as opposed to one that is drawn on to paper. Does anyone out there see the faces first in this one? Old Lady or Young Woman? Here is another optical illusion that I was introduced to around the same time in childhood as I learned about the Rubin Vase. In this case, you might see a young lady or you might see an old woman. I actually still have trouble finding the old woman in the picture because my eyes so intensely focus on the young lady but I know other people who see the old woman easily. Everyone has told me that if I can see the young girl then I just need to look at where her chin is and try to see it as the nose of the old woman. Do you see the old woman here? Face Peering At You This drawing is a much more complex one so it really intrigues me. And there is a face that peers out at you from the image. I happen to think that this is one of the most interesting face-related optical illusion drawings that exists. Not So Simple Sax Player Getting back to that simpler black-and-white style optical illusion drawing that we were first introduced to with the Rubin Vase, we can see that there are different images that can be done this way. Do you see the face in white here? I can see both. However, you can look more closely and see an old man who is turned facing the right of the screen. How do people come up with this stuff?! I happen to find this one less interesting than some of the others because the face looks way too obvious to me. What do you think of it? Devilish Women Saving the best for last perhaps, this one seems particularly cool to me albeit a little bit creepy. What I see first is a really scary devilish face staring out at me. What other people see first is a couple of women standing in front of their own reflections in a mirror.

What day comes after Saturday? My great love is working with herbs, turning them into nourishing remedies that I share through my books, articles, demonstrations, and Herbal Remedy Workshops. Click here to book an online or in-person workshop with me, and learn how to make your own inspiring home apothecary. For months I squirreled away a few dollars here, a few more there, scouring thrift stores and sale bins to get a tent, backpack, gas bottles for cooking, all the little bits and pieces needed to make a home away from home in the rainforest. I worked long hours getting all my writing and photography assignments done ahead of time, spent hours outside making sure all the plants were well-watered and mulched, stocked up on animal feed, and secured my campsite. So, in spite of those niggling fear-based stories in the back of my mind, I loaded my little car to the gills, kissed Bear good-bye, and set off for adventure. The fear hit me like a tidal wave at my first stop, Ravensbourne National Park. I swallowed it down, determined to enjoy the spectacular view, gloriously cool winds, and stunning wildflowers that tumbled through the meadow and over fence posts. Then a car pulled up, and out came two old ladies, grinning from ear to ear as they strolled up to me and started chatting. They were out for adventure too, just the two of them, and when I told them what I was doing, their faces lit up like Christmas trees. We cheered each other on, bid farewell as if we were old friends, and I went on my first solo hike down a steep, winding path into the rainforest. Streaks of sunlight shimmering down through gaps in the canopy, glistening on lush ferns and verdant palms. But I got out, grabbed my camera and water bottle, and headed out onto the trail, only to run into another old lady. She was all alone too, wandering the trails with her trusty camera, having a marvellous time scouting for birds and getting close-ups of tree bark and teensy wildflowers. I smiled so big, and felt a big whoosh of courage and excitement fill my soul. Off I went, discovering water pools and waterfalls, amazing rock formations, and the prettiest little birds flitting along beside me on the trail. I got back to my car after stopping to chat with my hero old lady, filled with pride yet again that fear had not won. I made it up to the Bunya Mountains, set up camp, and slept like a log. No fear, no nightmares, not even a tremor when wallabies snuffled around my tent in the dark nibbling grass. The next morning, I headed out for my first big solo hike – 14 km through rainforest, meadow, and up and down innumerable mountain trails. It was stunningly beautiful with great swathes of ferns, massive vines twisting up into the treetops, and wallabies bounding off into the undergrowth. I hiked and hiked, stopping to take pictures of fallen bunya nuts and colourful fungi, heading deeper and deeper into the mountains. About half an hour in, the fear started up again. Thanks in no small part to not meeting a single soul on the trail and the appearance of birds whose calls literally sound like the scream of a newborn baby. And suddenly, I was angry. Angry that this beautiful moment was scarred by fear. They just merrily went along creating fear, pain, and mayhem, while us good guys have to plan defensive manoeuvres just to go for a walk in the woods. I was angry that to do something I loved, I had to plan for the possibility of evil. Then I was angry at all males. Sorry, good males. Angry that if a guy wants to go camping by himself, travel by himself, hike by himself, he literally just goes. He just does it. This one was at least years-old. She wore pink and white striped socks, a jaunty hat, and wore a massive camera around her neck. No, she was happily and peacefully doing what she loved. I stopped and we chatted about birds and the forest, and as we bid each other good day and I headed back down the trail, I started to cry, for I finally understood these amazing, brave, wonderful old ladies. They lived in love, not fear. In that moment, my fear and anger disappeared. It was like someone had scrubbed me clean of all those awful feelings and thrown away the scouring pad. For the next 5 days, I had no fear. I hiked all over that park by myself, slept in a tent by myself, cooked meals, watched the sunrise and sunset, and created art and read books under the trees all by myself. I chatted with men and women alike as I met them on the trail, I gave directions to German tourists, and listened to the cute elderly couple camping next to me sing Beatles songs in perfect harmony. By the time my friend Sallie arrived to hang out with me for the last couple of days, I felt like a new woman, a strong and fearless and filled-to-bursting-with-love-for-life woman. I will treasure those days
