Several examples of his music, such as Farewell! But Whenever You Welcome the Hour are available online. Some of them were made by Irish composers wanting to improve the accompaniments of Stevenson, which were often considered too simple or not appropriate to the songs. Among these were arrangements by Michael William Balfe London: James Duffy, , Francis Robinson Jr. Other works[ edit ] In Moore wrote M. Although it received positive reviews Moore did not enjoy writing for the stage and decided not to work in the medium again despite being occasionally tempted. After originally being a devoted supporter of the Prince of Wales, he turned against him after when he became Prince Regent and was seen to embrace the Tory government in spite of his past association with the Whigs. Around this time Moore also began working on a biography of the playwright and politician Richard Brinsley Sheridan , whom he met numerous times, but partly due to legal reasons it was not published until In company with Lord John Russell he went to the Continent and after a Grand Tour through France, Switzerland and Italy lived in Paris until notably with the family of Martin de Villamil , when the debt was finally paid off partly with the help of his latest patron Lord Lansdowne and with an advance given him by his publisher Longmans. During his travels across Europe he briefly spent time with Lord Byron in Venice: Byron gave Moore his memoirs with instruction to publish them after his death as a literary executor. After returning to Britain, Moore published new poetry, but in spite of good reviews and good sales he was growing disillusioned with writing poetry and he began to consider writing novels, a genre made increasingly popular by the success of Walter Scott. It proved very popular, went through a number of editions quickly and helped give Moore a more serious reputation among his literary contemporaries. Later life[ edit ] Thomas Moore, after a painting by Thomas Lawrence He finally settled in Sloperton Cottage at Bromham, Wiltshire , England, and became a novelist and biographer as well as a successful poet. Around the time of the Reform Act he was invited to stand for parliament, and considered it, but nothing came of it. He received a state pension, but his personal life was dogged by tragedy including the deaths of all his five children within his lifetime Anne Barbara, age 5, d. Moore died being cared for by his wife at Sloperton on 26 February His remains are in a vault at St. Nicholas churchyard, Bromham, within view of his cottage-home, beside his daughter Anastasia. Moore is commemorated in several places: There is a road in Walkinstown , Dublin, named Thomas Moore Road, in a series of roads named after famous composers, locally referred to as the Musical Roads. Many composers have set the poems of Thomas Moore to music. The song "Believe Me If All Those Endearing Young Charms" is often used in a famous gag in a number of Warner Brothers cartoons, usually involving a piano or Xylophone rigged to explode when a certain note is played. The hero, typically Bugs Bunny , tries to play the melody line of the song, but always misses the rigged note C above middle C. The villain or rival, finally exasperated, pushes the hero aside and plays the song himself, striking the correct note and blowing himself up. In one instance, however, the protagonist plays the melody on a xylophone and, upon striking the rigged note, the antagonist explodes in an "old gag, new twist.

Tom had never been part of any of my plans, but I just couldn't get rid of him. He wasn't bad, and he was great to look at, but he just wasn't part of the plan. When an attempt is made on his brother's life, Tom and his sister get ordered back to the family home.

How Moore managed to construct this causeway or why he was chosen to do so is unknown. He had received no formal training in bridge construction and considered himself a farmer up until this point. In addition, Moore earned the attention and respect of John Mason, who would prove to be an invaluable ally in the forthcoming years. On March 29, 1792, Congress approved an act to "regulate the laying out and making a road from Cumberland [Maryland] President Jefferson was authorized to appoint three commissioners to oversee the project and selected Thomas Moore that summer. Yet, the two men knew each other well, and it is not impossible to imagine favoritism at play. Moreover, the act allowed for a surveyor to accompany the commissioners. Therefore, their task was largely logistical and technical expertise was not strictly necessary. Ten years later, the engineer Benjamin Henry Latrobe recalled in a letter to President James Madison that the "road was laid out by three Commissioners none of whom were professional men. Shortly after, Moore wrote to Jefferson trying to finagle more personal compensation than was originally approved by Congress. The reply was a stern reprimand from the U. The task was arduous and slow moving. In his report to Jefferson, Moore wrote that: They returned to the frontier in the spring of 1797, but by the time that Moore left the project in January of 1798, work still had not been completed. Nevertheless, in the end, Moore left the project with a much greater understanding of topography and surveying. After spending a year and a half in the frontier wilderness, Moore turned his attention to local affairs. Three years earlier, he purchased a piece of property on the west side of Brookeville which would eventually become the Brookeville Tannery. The tannery was primarily used to make soles and upper leathers for shoe manufacturing. He owned the tannery until 1795, when he sold it to William Woodward and Henry Howard. In 1796, he expanded his involvement in manufacturing, joining his two brothers-in-law, Isaac Briggs and Caleb Bentley to found a small town north of Brookeville known as Triadelphia. Of the three men, Moore had the smallest investment but was still peripherally involved for the next twenty years. Unfortunately for Moore, it was never a profitable enterprise within his lifetime, although during the period of the War of 1812, the mills offered a great hope for independence from foreign imports. Although Moore turned down the offer, he maintained a professional relationship with the company for the rest of his life. Moore passed on this opportunity because, in 1800, he was already engaged in a different engineering project on the Potomac. For the previous two decades, silt deposits had built up to such quantities in the Potomac that a large sandbank was obstructing ship traffic around Georgetown. Moore believed that these dams would push incoming water towards a fixed center point, thus increasing the speed and volume of water flow. This powerful stream of water would then hit the sandbank, forcing out the silt and deepening the ship channel. The Georgetown City Council approved the plan and contracted Moore and his neighbor David Newlin to construct the dams and maintain them for two years. Newlin was the owner of his own milling operation in Brookeville where he produced plaster and therefore could provide building materials at a low cost. The two men stood to gain a lot from the project. The Washington Bridge Company obtained a temporary court injunction against the project out of fear that the forced water might damage their bridge downstream. Work was halted until the court could make a final judgment that January. Latrobe was, arguably, the foremost American engineer and architect of his day. Born to American parents in England and educated there, Latrobe was and still is well-respected for designing many early American building projects, notably the U. However, when Latrobe was summoned to court, he had no alternative but to provide his honest opinion. His experience had taught him that water hitting the walls of the wing dams would not be funneled into the center of the river but rather, deflected outwards creating eddies and rogue currents. Moreover, he testified that the project might damage the Washington. In the meantime, Moore wrote to Latrobe on February 2 and in a curt letter, subtly threatened to go to the press if Latrobe did not retract his opinion. When Latrobe incredulously rebuffed the threat, Moore denied ever making it. Probably with much regret and frustration, he was hired as a consultant for the engineer now in the position he had turned down only a year earlier. In March , Latrobe was called in again and delivered much the same testimony. Less than a month later, war was declared on Great Britain and the War of drew attention away from the controversy. To keep up with the demand of the war, the company constructed a second mill in and worked over 6, spindles. On December 15, , shortly before the end of the war, part of the factory burned down. Regardless, by , Moore was back in Brookeville to oversee the construction of his new mansion, " Longwood. Back in Brookeville for a short time, Moore kept busy. He once more became involved in the Quaker meeting at Sandy Spring, becoming an elder in the local meeting. Those are both bad concerns and have given me a great deal of trouble. Moore was principally engaged in evaluating the viability of the Potomac Canal. In , the Potomac Company the same one that Moore had worked for several years prior applied to the Virginia Board of Public Works for assistance in judging how best to proceed with its burgeoning debt and stalled progress. The company had been floundering for decades and many believed that it could no longer fulfill its mission.

His life and locations became very different from his siblings. He was about 29 years old and Rachel about 28. She was the daughter of James Moore, Jr. But how and why this Thomas was back in Maryland is perplexing. Shannon Graham, a descendant, claims that Thomas never left Maryland and that his father, John 2 did not go to Virginia until when Thomas was 17. That seems at odds with other descriptions we have for this family. It is possible that Thomas, for some reason, went from Virginia to Baltimore to make his way. The situation is not at all clear. But upon marriage Thomas appears to have settled in Maryland, probably on land that was gifted to his wife, by her uncle, Nicholas Ruxton Gay, the year of her marriage. In 1730, Thomas and his wife Rachel, are mentioned a few years after their marriage on a land sale in Virginia, involving lands received in common by will from John 2, along with Mary, the mother of Thomas, and brothers, Absolom and Richard. It is by this transaction, that Thomas is linked to the Virginia Chenoweths of John 2. Thomas and Rachel had 4 known children, all mentioned in a guardianship proceeding some 7 years after his death. Rachel had died at 28, in Maryland, some five years before Thomas. Two years later, on August 10, 1732, Thomas remarried to Ann Carroll, and shortly thereafter, they moved to Botetourt Co. Henry had married a Cloe. In some accounts her name is given as Cloe Chenoweth, but there is no family fit for such a person. Henry had lived in Virginia and was known to have had land dealings with William who married Ruth Calvert while there. This William was the brother of Thomas. Ann and Thomas are known to have had one son born before Thomas died in in Botetourt County. This location in Virginia is very different from any other Virginia locations of the Chenoweths. In theory, Ann, the widow, remained there and raised her one son and four stepchildren, probably in close proximity to the Switzers. The Switzers would remain for some time in Botetourt and some of their descendants still live there today including lines from Elizabeth, the daughter of Thomas and Rachel, who married Nathan Switzer. Of other lines of Thomas only two are known to present times, that of his son, Nicholas Ruxton Chenoweth, who married Mary Switzer and the newly devolped line of James Francis who married Rebecca Safley. Both families left Virginia just after the turn of the 19th Century and went first to Kentucky. Nicholas would eventually settle in the area of Williamson Co. There is still much to be learned of the interplay of these families and their relations. There are still things to be learned of the two other children of Thomas. This place seems awkward for it is not known how or why Mary would have been in this location. The location is somewhat close to the locations of the families of Thomas 2. He is not seen again but is a good candidate for the Thomas who shows up to marry Ann Quirk in Louisiana.
