Mark Rothko, Untitled By Chris Michaels, Esq. Inadvertently, the dispute sheds light on the often hidden intricacies and nuance of confidential deals. The lessons to be learned from this controversy may protect future sellers and buyers who may wish to enter into private sale agreements. Plaintiff and her late husband pledged to donate their collection to the Dallas Museum of Art upon their death, although they retained the option to sell paintings during the lifetime. Hoffman is a trustee, prior to the sale, and Hoffman made a conscious decision to use a private sale option to safeguard from the public her decision to dispose of the work instead of donating it to the museum. In addition, the buyer agrees not to hang or display the work for six months following receipt of the painting. But for the resulting controversy, the terms of the sale as well as the sale itself would have remained hidden from the public. Studio Capital thereafter took possession of the painting and put it in storage. The damages award itself presents a thorny procedural issue that will not be explored here. After the award was entered on behalf of Hoffman, all defendants moved for judgment as a matter of law, meaning that defendants were of the opinion that no reasonable jury could have found for the Plaintiff based on the available evidence. Essentially, Martinez and Studio Capital argued that they could not breach the confidentiality provision of the Letter Agreement because they were not bound by the Agreement in the first place, or were even aware of its existence. In reviewing the Martinez and Studio Capital motions, the U. There are, however, already a few important takeaways of which buyers, sellers, and dealers should be aware. One is that sophisticated buyers should be very clear with their dealers and intermediaries who purchase artwork as part of a private sale. An agreement in writing with respect to what the dealer is authorized to do, or not do on behalf of the buyer would, in light of the above case, be prudent. Additionally, buyers should be considerate of what they communicate or promise to a seller in private sales. Memorandum and Order, in Hoffman v. He may be reached at , chriswmichaels gmail. Will she be able to stand firm for the sake of the world, or will she falter in the face of defeat? A familiar voice called my name over and over. Furious howls ripped through the air. None of those sounds made sense to me. My body ached, muscles locked tight in protest. Each painful pulse rattled against my skull, sending ripples down my neck and into my back. I groaned and rolled onto my side. The hands shaking me relaxed. I fought to open my eyes, then blinked, confused. Worn brown carpet scratched against the side of my face. The bottom edge of a pale blue bed-sham fluttered inches from me. Dust bunnies and small pieces of plastic were strewn beneath the sagging bed. A table and two chairs were grouped on the other side. A crack ran up the leg of one chair, splitting the wood. None of the room looked familiar. The voice calling my name stopped mid-shout and sighed. Oh, thank god, he said. How was that possible? I knew the speaker. At least I thought I did. Before I could ask him who he was or how he spoke in my head, someone blew out a sharp breath. Definitely not coming from my mind. I rolled my eyes toward the relieved sound, and then frowned at the guy leaning over me. Long, dark hair hung in his face. His eyes were black, and full of concern. His features were sharp, severe, but handsome. This time I was certain; I knew this guy. His name was Ronan LaCrosse, and mine was Arionna. Memory began to slowly trickle back in. We were at a motel in Illinois, looking for someone. I tried to figure out why I was on the floor, but came up with a big blank. He held out a hand for me, then pulled me into a sitting position. The room tilted before straightening again. I clutched my head in my hands, groaning. When the initial wave of nausea passed, I tilted my head up slowly so I could see Ronan. I scooted back against the edge of the bed, frowning. What was I supposed to remember?
