But are foreign language movies really a great way to learn a language? Or are they a big waste of time? After all, it sounds like you can sit down in front of your TV, and expect to miraculously become fluent in Italian after 90 minutes of watching Cinema Paradiso. When watching foreign language movies fails, you can end up tossing the whole idea of watching movies in favour of your tried and tested flashcards. Watching foreign language movies can help you learn another language, if you go about it the right way. You have to study a movie. Here are the five attributes of a study-focused approach to movies: Break up movies into smaller chunks of time " even down to just one scene or a small 10 minute segment " for greater language absorption. Repetition Watching a movie just once is akin to looking at a flashcard just once. If you are going to study the material you need to review it multiple times. Engagement You should be actively engaged with your movie. Speak along with the characters, practice mimicking their pronunciation, and copy their body language. Subtitles Subtitles can either be a huge crutch, or an incredible study aid. Using them the right way can elevate your study of a language to new heights. Pick a Movie You Like, With Subtitles The key here is to make sure your movie has excellent subtitles, both in your target language and your native language. This is no time to settle for second-rate products. It will be worth your while to shell out a bit more money for the right DVD. You should also pick a movie that you have some familiarity with or covers a topic you are interested in. Learn the story and get to know the characters Break the movie up into segments Watch the movie all the way through with your native language subtitles on. Also, at the same time take out a notebook and pen to write down time markers for short segments of the story. This time, just watch the first segment and turn on the foreign language subtitles. Pay particular attention to words or phrases that seem significant to the story or are repeated regularly. Since you have the subtitles on you can easily pause the movie to write down words and phrases, then look up in your dictionary. Aim to collect around 20 new words and around 10 new phrases per segment. Just pick the ones that stand out to you. You can always go back and repeat this step again to pick up more vocabulary. Watch the segment at least five times while picking out your selection of words and phrases. Repeat the words as you hear them to work on your pronunciation. With a 10 minute segment, this step should take about an hour or two. Once you have a list of vocabulary add them to your SRS Spaced Repetition System flashcard deck , and include them in your daily vocabulary review. Next, turn off the subtitles and see how much you can understand without them. For this step play the segment between five and ten times, depending on how many characters there are and the amount of dialogue. By the end of an hour or two you should have pretty good comprehension. To give yourself a more intensive study session, imagine yourself as one of the characters in the film and when someone asks them a question, quickly pause the movie and try to answer as that character. Then push play and see how you did. Take note of the actual dialogue to see how you could adapt your response. Review the Film with Your Tutors and Teachers To take things to the next level, meet with a language exchange partner or your teacher, and watch the film together. Be sure to let them know ahead of time what parts of the film you want to study so they can look it up and watch it before they meet with you. Here are some ideas of what you can cover with your teacher: Ask for clarification on phrases or accents that are used in the film. Have your teacher ask you questions about a specific segment, then try to answer them in the target language. Have your teacher play the part of one of the characters in the movie and practice dialogues with you. These are just a few ideas to get your started. Your teacher may have other suggestions for how to use the movie in your study sessions together. Not sure how to find a teacher? The language network italki helps you locate native speaking teachers that you can meet up with from the comfort of your home using Skype. With Skype you can share your screen and review specific segments of the movie together! As you can see, studying a foreign movie takes time, effort and focus. I recommend spending at least three days, studying for at least one hour each day, studying each segment in your chosen movie. It sounds like a lot, but you will get quicker and quicker, and be able to watch a subsequent one quicker, and eventually simply enjoy the movie in the target language the first time. Of course, whatever method you decide to use, the benefits of studying foreign movies are countless. I love watching foreign language movies, because they: Expose you to new cultural situations. Are a great way to observe body language and other nonverbal cues. Allow you to pick up idioms and colloquial ways of expressing ideas. Watching foreign movies can benefit your language learning projects, but only if you study them. Approach watching foreign movies the same way you approach any other part of your language learning project. Let us know in the comments.

Chapter 3 : Watch your language when talking about autism

This is especially the case when it comes to disability. Activists have campaigned hard to eradicate such terms, which are offensive and perpetuate a negative view of disabled people – one as passive, unable to take control over their own lives. Responding to this demand, recent government guidelines have encouraged clinicians and teachers to use positive and inclusive language, including the use of language that does not define people by their disability. This has become the recommended way to speak with or about disability – in the press, journal articles, hospitals and schools. It is difficult not to see the good intentions behind this approach. But perhaps it is not really as inclusive as it claims to be. Nowhere is this issue more hotly debated than the field of autism. These are difficult questions. But it is surely not difficult to argue that truly inclusive language should be defined by the people who are actually autistic. Not by well-meaning outsiders, no matter how powerful. Take a look at the actuallyautistic and describingautism twitter handles to see some of these debates. Not right for everyone Recently, together with the National Autistic Society , my colleagues and I asked 3, autistic people, parents and their broader support network, about the words they use to describe themselves, their children or the people with whom they work. But there was much disagreement on the use of several words and phrases. They thought that the term allowed them to describe the centrality of autism to their lives. One autistic woman said: Agree to disagree But these preferences were not unanimous, of course. Instead, for autistic people, family members and professionals, the words they used often hinged on what people believed autism to be. Those who felt that autism is one trait of many in a person tended to prefer person-first language. Others still noted the need to use different words depending on whom one is speaking to. There is no one way of describing autism on which everyone can agree. There never will be. In order to answer who the question of who gets to decide which terms should be used, first, everyone connected to autism needs to come to accept the fact of disagreement and to respond to it with openness, flexibility and tolerance of divergence of opinion. We should always seek to establish how people wish to be described – by asking them directly, if possible – and not impose external views or guidelines upon them. Perhaps even more importantly, we need to create the conditions for debate and conversation between all of the people who are touched by autism and work in the field. It is, after all, only when we listen to each other that we discover what individual words are taken to mean and why they often matter so much.
