

Chapter 1 : What I Learned From Trying to be the “Wolf of Wall Street” | The Utopian Life

Thanks for sharing your experience! I too worked on Wall Street and actually lived on Wall Street my first two years in Manhattan. The hours were so brutal getting in by AM and leaving past PM every day.

That makes more sense now! High yield and distressed debt sounds much more fancy: Will your partner continue to work after you FIRE? It is a really interesting rate environment today. Rates should go up but there is so much cash in the system yields on the corporate side are insanely low, for companies that are increasingly highly levered. Just have to watch your convexity! If someone is a top performer they are usually allowed a lot more slack. Do they have egregious spending habits? A lot do yes. Do all of them? Index funds are great however being your own pm makes more sense. How is an index fund going to work forever. Is the market really efficient if everyone buys the exact same stocks in equal weight? Now you all know why Warren Buffett preaches this. In addition, when everyone sells they will sell incorrectly as well ETFs managed by emotional people. The lifestyle definitely gets easier the longer you are in. My schedule now is much, much easier than it was when I started. It was a matter of experience and moving to the buy side. I was top of my class each year I was at my Wall Street firm and to my senior manager that meant he should be harder on me and expect more from me. Underperformers were more likely to be ignored since he knew they would be out the door at the end of their analyst contracts anyway. Of course not everyone has the spending habits I mentioned in this piece. Some of my closest friends I met while working in that first job out of school and many people were great mentors and teachers. But the loudest and most in your face people are totally the egregious spenders. But I also think years of data show us that very, very few retail investors can beat the market over the long term. I learned a ton, made some great friends, and am in a much more fun, balanced job today. I got to learn my priorities, and the life I wanted to pursue. The good news is, buy the dip and buy small cap ETFs! There is a reason mutual fund investor returns are dramatically lower than the returns of the actual funds! But whether those people are being their own PMs or investing in index funds, their panic is likely still going to get the best of them. Hopefully, everyone that was just out of school in and got to see the crash and the following recovery will be smarter at sticking to DCA as investors. Though, as you said, all we can do is wait and see! More than half of them will sell creating a massive dislocation again. Will be fun to watch the next one. Small caps for everyone! I will admit when I was younger, the movies had me thinking Wall Street was something to strive for. I am glad that the conclusion is: Further, I am guessing that few, if any, people really want to live like this. The great river of the rat race is powerful and sweeps us away, so thanks J. Money and Chelsea for the posts and the blogs. The alternative needs to be communicated! With any job, it would be great if the FIRE message was spread wider so that people were working for careers and lives they actually want. Thanks for reading my story! But, the trading floor I worked on was pretty exciting sometimes. You can just feel the energy pulsing through the room. I secretly wanted to work on Wall Street but never had the guts to actually try to make it. Thanks for providing a peek behind the Wall Street curtain: Will be interesting to see how the Street squares that circle over the next several years. Thanks for checking out my post! Reply 16 Tara April 28, at 7: My brother is a finance lawyer deals with contracts and never litigates and working for a big NYC firm, he works crazy hours, but most firms have waves of work so you have down time too. One firm he was at never had down time and he started having stress induced vision problems. Doctor told him he had to take it easy, so he reached out to recruiters and changed to a new firm he has been happy with since and his eye problem went away luckily. That neurologist just happened to see a lot of my peers. Stress in any form does incredible things to our bodies. Glad to hear your brother is doing better and found a firm that works for him! As a related aside, I was listening to the results of a study yesterday that found a direct correlation between the size differences in the index and ring finger of a male stock broker and how much money they make. My ring fingers are longer than my index fingers, so hopefully that correlation applies to women too! Reply 20 FullTimeFinance April 28, at 8: Thanks for sharing MFS. However living in Delaware those big banks are everywhere. All of their off street support staff for many of their businesses appear to be here JP Morgans data center for example is down the road, all the credit card stuff for Barclays and Cap one is also near by. They have a reputation here of paying the local staffing poorly but expecting the same types of hours as Wall Street. It is ridiculous what they expect of those employees for local market pay. Probably a good move avoiding them! Reply 22 Brian April 28, at 8: Glad you survived and got out Chelsea. I am glad to be in a more sensible place in my career now and excited to have even more control over my life in a few years. You are right that I definitely gained a lot of clarity on it after leaving. Especially with the long hours surrounded by people who are all living the same life, it is easy to get sucked into thinking it's normal. Thanks for reading, Brian! I had a similar bout with stress last year "I thought I was having heart problems. You have some great content at mamafishsaves. Sorry to hear about your fight with stress. I hope you are feeling better now. Stress can really take years off our life, it is pretty scary. Thanks for the kind words on the blog! I do need to introduce the concept of FIRE over there though! A couple of my regulars read this post and emailed to ask what FIRE was "oops! Training in medicine is similarly butt kicking. The downside is we do not get any bonuses. Thanks for sharing your story with us! But at least she loves it and is helping people! There is no denying that the bonuses are awesome though!" Reply 28 Mike Collins April 28, at I do know some people who work on Wall Street and they never seem to be at the kids softball and soccer games with other parents"now I understand why. Thanks for sharing your story Chelsea! Thanks for reading, Mike! People talk about lifestyle inflation "with every bonus or pay raise you spend more "but the shift in perspective is really what changes people. Going from grateful for having a job to entitled because of it. Unfortunately, I think a lot of people today struggle with self-worth and convince themselves the lifestyle is a fair trade off for the income. Some people, no doubt, love the rush and the work but far more seem trapped or complacent. Thanks so much for your thoughts and kind words! We need to live life with a balance that makes us happy"money is not the only thing to make a rich life: Reply 33 Joe April 28, at I was thinking about encouraging my kid to go into finance, but probably not now. It sounds really stressful. Now, I can rest easy and stick with my low cost index fund strategy. There are so many aspects to finance that can be incredibly intellectually stimulating and firms that have pretty great work-life balance. And yes, stick with that index fund strategy: Take advantage of it!

The community is smaller and close knit, having the sense of being a boutique trading firm. Through their trading courses and chat room, they are producing a group of passionate traders and dedicated members. Bulls on Wall Street: Since the business has expanded to include a Boot Camp style day trading course. Traders familiar with Kunal will almost certainly think of him as a friendly, fun loving individual. He runs his business much like we might think of a Silicon Valley start up. He trades in the morning from his ocean front home while wearing one of his favorite neon colored tank tops, then goes beach side for the afternoon to hang out with friends. I think many people would look at Kunal as a man who is living the dream. Running a small business, trading the markets, and enjoying life. He also spends a good amount of time on the road traveling in Central America and around the United States on various adventures. Perhaps most importantly, Kunal is somebody that both his students and fellow traders admire and look up to. Kunal jumps in the chat room often moments before the bell rings, asking traders in the chat room which stocks are gapping up. Sometimes it feels a bit scattered. As we all know, a lot can change overnight so sometimes there are stocks that are in play the next morning but new traders might not know about them. As a skilled trader I take no issue with his approach, but a morning recap would be helpful. Strategies at Bulls on Wall Street The Bulls on Wall Street chat room is setup as an audio video feed with screen share and chat room access. This gives traders a direct view into what Kunal is looking at which I think is very helpful. His strategy is fairly equally long and short, with a focus on flag breakdowns on the short side and flag breakouts to the long side. I think there could be improvement in this area. Again, I think this is an area where a beginner trader could get confused, but skilled traders should have no issue here. Kunal is a really funny and entertaining person. He lives with his roommates also his employees , and hearing them tell stories of getting into bar fights or Kevin making a fool of himself are hilarious. For many traders, this career can be fairly isolating. This makes being a member of a chat room enjoyable, and Kunal definitely brings the entertainment here. I think very few people could be a member of the Bulls on Wall Street chat room and not get a good laugh on a near daily basis. In keeping with many other trading courses, he covers all of the basics of trading before moving into the more advanced day trading strategies. While many courses by competitors are recordings only, the Bulls on Wall Street classes are live. This is nice because of the obvious advantage of being able to ask the teacher questions. We feel Kunal and his fellow instructors provide a solid and transparent trading platform that is good for begins and exceptional for skilled traders. Kunal provides education in an easy to digest format. His teaching style is conversational, funny, and easy to comprehend. There are a few other chat rooms that provide equally good value for experienced traders, and perhaps more value for beginner traders, but the Bulls on Wall Street should remain on the list of services to test out. His channel is currently inactive, but if he starts streaming again we will be sure to link to that channel. As always, if you have questions or thoughts, please comment below!

By Turney Duff A formal degree might be a necessity for most entry-level jobs on Wall Street, but the real Wall Street education comes from experience. It was , and I was wearing L. Bean boots and a flannel shirt when I arrived in the City. Shortly thereafter, I accidentally got a job on Wall Street. I was an unlikely candidate for Wall Street mediocrity. I had to figure it out as I went along. Right out of the gate, I was out-connected, out-degreed, and out-experienced. My peers came from the Ivy Leagues and had multiple internships. On my first day, I realized there was no way I could stand out at my job by faking it. After four years at Morgan Stanley, I started looking for my next gig. One interviewer asked me about the value of the Japanese yen. I had no idea what the answer was. But I knew the worst thing I could do in that situation was to try and fake it, so I said: I was offered the job. I got up and left the interview and started parading around their trading desk. And then I finally found someone who knew the answer to my interview question. Within five minutes, I was back in the glassed-in conference room with the correct answer. In spring , I started working at a now-infamous hedge fund, the Galleon Group. Showing up for work every day felt like living in the second act of a slasher flick " nobody was safe. I had to stand in the corner for five minutes as punishment when I booked a trade wrong. But I never made the same mistake twice. So I learned everything matters. Every job is like an audition for the next. And the best way to do that is to excel at your current job. I used that mindset when I was hired as a technical advisor on the pilot of the Showtime series Billions. At the Galleon Group, I noticed the most successful traders around me focused on the basics. They were in early, stayed late, and continually asked questions. I followed their lead. And because of the high-pressure stakes at Galleon, it changed my work ethic, assertiveness, and resilience for all my endeavors " far beyond finance. There are always going to be smarter, faster, stronger, and better-looking people than you. But if you choose " nobody can out-hustle you. And I started giving out buy and sell orders. Early on I was taught that with trading, one of the best things I could learn how to do is limit a loss. Identify when you are wrong and change the course. He paused, and then whispered through the phone: My biotech trader is out today and the guy backing him up sucks! But instantly I had a newfound trust in my sales trader. He was looking out for my best interest. Being a trader forced me to make decisions and have conviction. The timid get trampled on Wall Street. You must make judgment calls all day, every day " and most important, have reasoning behind it. Of course, results matter, but on a trading desk, you must be able to articulate why you made a decision " have an opinion. One of the reasons I was able to work my way up and become a founding partner of Argus Partners, a billion-dollar health care hedge fund, was that I learned how to anticipate. To be successful at a hedge fund, you have to dodge bullets, put out fires, and make money. And the only way to do that is by anticipating who has a gun, where the fires typically start, and how to get information. When my boss was out of the office, I could predict his needs and act. When you ask is as important as what you ask. Shortly after turning 40 years old and returning from my second rehab stint, I finally left the business of finance. But I used everything I learned on Wall Street to become an author and speaker, and to work in television. Regardless of what you end up doing later in life, the knowledge and work ethic required to succeed on the Street can benefit you forever.

BlockedUnblock FollowFollowing I write transparently from my own experience to support others in living more fulfilling lives duncanriach. In the early two-thousands, I was an early employee at a Silicon Valley technology company that designs and markets cutting-edge computer processing chips. When I started, there were a few dozen other people. When I left, there were thousands. I was a computer processor engineer, architect, and manager. The company is now one of the largest and most successful in the world. I made some number of million dollars. I never really figured out exactly how much it was. I think it might have been around five million. I know that my adjusted gross income in at least one year was about one-and-a-half million dollars. I was making at least five-hundred thousand per year. Here are some of the things I learned from being relatively rich. I remember getting to the end of a particularly challenging but satisfying project, putting my feet up on my desk, taking a deep breath, and realizing that I had it all. I had the fancy million-dollar house in Mountain View where Google is based. I had a small mortgage on that house, but I could have paid that off any time I wanted. I had a house in another country that I owned outright. I had the luxury cars that I purchased with cash. I had the attractive wife at home. I was highly respected where I worked. I had freedom to work on whatever I chose. I had a very high salary, lucrative stock options, and more money than I knew what to do with. But I felt anxious and dissatisfied. On some level, my striving for success had been driven by a belief that my deep suffering would go away when I had enough wealth. I learned first-hand that once our basic needs are taken care of, the level of contentment and happiness we experience has nothing to do with how much wealth we have. In fact, wealth can actually make life worse. Life might also get a lot more complicated with wealth. I have become aware that I tend to worry about not having enough money in the future, and that this fear has been with me all of my life. It is not correlated with my net equity or my net cash-flow. You can only help people to help themselves Instead of buying a holiday home at Lake Tahoe or a some investment properties, I purchased a house in another country for some members of my extended family to live in. I let them live there without paying rent for a few years. I was essentially giving them tens of thousands of dollars per year from my own pocket. I later found out that these people resented me for doing this. They felt that I was treating them like children and claimed that I had not included them in the process of choosing and buying the house. They claimed that I had caused them to lose the favorable tenancy for a much smaller house that they had with their previous landlord. Financially, I lost not only the rent for that house, but enormous amounts of money in currency exchanges, in buying and selling fees, and in having a very low return on investment. The whole process consumed much of my time and energy over an extended period time. I used to believe that people were inherently reasonable and good. This process taught me that I should not assume that people can be relied upon, or that other people will necessarily receive from me in the same way that I receive from others. I learned another big lesson from this. In fact, the problem is going to just get worse. The trick is to figure out how much money you actually need and want in order to get your pragmatic needs met. How much money do you need to live a reasonable lifestyle? Optionally, you could also work out how much wealth you need to accumulate in order to become financially independent while living your chosen lifestyle. I believed that I was fundamentally worthless. Through a process of psychotherapy, coaching, authentic friendships, and healing intimate relationships, I came to understand that I have a rich intrinsic value. Others enjoy me just for my essence, and I learned how to internalize that so that now I can enjoy myself just for my essence also. Luxury is an addictive drug The frugal blogger Mr. Money Mustache tells us that luxury is weakness. Luxury is an addictive drug. Until we understand this, it has the power to ruin our lives. I remember driving my brand new luxury sports car and noticing that my identity was becoming tied up with the car. I realized that this super-expensive car would wear out and then I would need to buy another one. To keep my identity, I would need to keep generating a lot of money. It was like having a drug habit. So I realized that I would need to keep having that fix to feel normal. This process of getting the drug to get back to normal is a common experience for drug addicts. Also, tolerance to the drug increases with abuse over time. An amount of the drug that was once satisfying starts to not have the desired effect. We find that we need more and more of the substance or experience to get back to normal. The more luxury you have, the more luxury you need, but luxury never really satisfies the itch that it promises to scratch. Luxury makes us feel successful, that we are winning at the game of life, that we are not only surviving, but thriving. Like an opioid in our brains, luxury locks into our survival receptors. The irony is that purchasing luxury, and being dependent on it for our sense of self and wellbeing, leads to us depleting the very resources that we actually need for survival. It turns out that having the discipline to live frugally, to invest rather than spend, to mend and make do, and to be able to live for longer and longer periods of time without having to work, are true measures of wealth. The people who are on the nine-to-five treadmill, working to pay for luxury cars to drive for two hours per day to and from work, are really on a luxury treadmill. These people are addicted to luxury. During that time, I have been getting a PhD, and starting some businesses. She instantly stopped talking to me and disappeared into the crowd. I remember feeling really hurt. Thoughts of my worthlessness came up. A few days later, after pondering what must have happened some more, I understood the irony that I was probably the richest person at the party. I know many people with extremely high net worths. Many of these people spend their time in pajamas, or flip-flops, or shorts. Then, later, I have seen these very same people starting to make and accumulate money, and I have seen them consuming conspicuously and showing off. I was a fool. You need to get out of that! During my last meeting with them, they asked me if they could exercise and sell some more of my stock options in order to buy some of company X. Later, I got an email telling me that a bunch of my stock options had been exercised and sold and that I was the proud owner of company X. I called them to ask what was happening. They said that I had told them to sell the stock. The guy on the phone told me that his partner had been there and witnessed it. I told them to undo the stock trades before I got jailed for insider trading, and I fired them. Looking back, I feel consoled understanding that the stock brokers knew nothing about the stocks either. I started reading books about investment. The most valuable information I learned was from Warren Buffet. With these stockbrokers, I had not even been buying managed mutual funds, I was buying individual stocks, relying only on their choices. In the book Laughing at Wall Street, the author explains how he made millions by beating institutional investors into and out of stocks by noticing trends on the street months before the institutional investors became aware of them. Mutual funds often have to maintain certain mixes of investments to stay within the parameters specified to those who have already invested in them. My local stockbrokers were not even that. Nevertheless, the incompetence on Wall Street is staggering. I recommend reading the book The Big Short a movie was made of it, to understand how much opportunity there is to make money by taking the radical approach of reading financial reports and thinking about them. This spread is so large several percent that they can make an enormous amount of money on a single transaction. After a few instances of transferring money internationally using my bank, I understood this problem. I kept finding much less money in the target currency than I had expected based on the market exchange rate. I discovered that there are currency brokerages that will buy and sell currencies, and transfer money internationally for you, with a variable spread that amounts to only a few thousand on a very large transaction. I have written many checks with six figures on them. You just write the number on there. This was an eye-opener for me. The number of zeros means nothing.

Chapter 5 : What I Learned Working on Wall Street | Budgets Are Sexy

I stopped trying to be like the "Wolf of Wall Street." I realized that when you put the needs of the people around you ahead of your own, you start nurturing your own compassion, empathy and understanding.

I was first introduced to the world of self-development when I was working as a full-time cold caller. Back on the horse. I did this for 9 straight months. During this time, and throughout my whole life, I have constantly been wrestling with the nagging question: I read and listened to all the self-development gurus: Always wanting to make myself the best I could be. I followed advice, changed my thought patterns, got up early, ate well, listened to inspirational music, avoided negative people, avoided negative news, exercised regularly, and on and on it went. Everyone else becomes the enemy and competition. All are much better terms and actually lead to a better self, ironically. For it is when you put the needs of others first that you are your best self. I realized that when you focus on the needs of others, you start nurturing your own compassion, empathy and understanding – qualities that are invaluable for every aspect of life. So my question to you is: Why do you want to develop yourself? Never let your own growth come at the expense of others; rather, with the empowerment of others. I am not saying that everything in the self-development space is evil – far from it. Do not forget how much you owe to the people around you, and before you. They started your story – you inherited it. Will your self-development be a gift to others, or a curse? How will people remember you? What kind of legacy will you leave behind? What I Learnt on Wall Street Mixer With summer here, we wanted to bring together all of our high flying professionals. The event will give you an opportunity to meet like minded people and network.

Most people watch movies to pass time or just let off some steam. When I watch a movie, I make it worth my while. I like thinking about the characters and their relationships, and what values or morals the movie was trying to get across. For all the talk of Hollywood being a soulless money making machine, which it essentially is, most movies do have a beneficial lesson or two in them. You just have to look for them. Belfort who ironically is currently a motivational speaker is a Wall Street broker. Which means he manages investments for people and gets a cut via commissions. He got an entry level job with a firm and was idealistic to the core. He just wanted to help people make money, and make a little bit himself in the process. As the story usually goes, he let the money get to his head. He eventually founded his own brokerage firm, which was doing some very shady stuff. They were essentially cheating people out of their money and getting fat on commissions. The FBI finally caught wind of this and he got some jail time, though not nearly enough in my opinion. The movie pretty much chronicles his career. But this post is not just a movie review. It also contains some financial lessons I picked up from watching: Mr Belfort and his cronies had one goal and one goal only: And they would do it by any means necessary. This included super high pressure sales tactics, misleading investors and lying to the SEC. The biggest thing I noticed from their methods is that they wanted to make the investor feel that this one investment decision is the most important one of their life. Because they seemed like a very legit and professional company, many investors complied. Never work with someone who wants you to make a decision right away. Any major life or investment decision takes time and thinking. If the salesperson wants you to make a decision on the spot, take your business elsewhere. There are a lot of gullible people out there. As the saying goes, there is a sucker born every minute. Belfort and friends defrauded a LOT of people out of their money with their antics. I was actually surprised that so many people were willing to invest so much money on a whim. It shows that as long as you have a good pitch, you can get a lot of people to buy your product. If you can effectively and honestly market yourself and are diligent about it, you should be able to get what you want money, clicks, ratings etc. No one knows what the market is going to do. This made it easy for the brokers to employ their high pressure tactics and make the investor seem like they had no other choice. It was also harder to get the latest business news so when the broker is telling you something big happened, you had to believe him. Do your research online. Online transactions are cheaper than phone transactions as well. There is never enough money. The main characters of this show totally gave themselves over to money. It was all they thought about day and night. This eventually landed them in lives of debauchery fueled by booze and sex, day after day. No matter how big their houses got, how fancy they traveled or how lavish their parties, they just wanted more and more. Until the FBI got them. Money is not an end, but a means.
