The piece had been sitting in their attic for close to a decade.

First, how many of the items are available. And, third, how much someone is willing to pay for it. Also, these programs have made the chance of finding a bargain in a shop a bit more unlikely. So everyone thinks whatever they have must be worth something! The condition of an antique or collectible greatly affects its value. The better condition of a piece, the greater its overall value. But there are exceptions. For instance, 18th and 19th-century furniture is believed to have been used. Dents, stains, and minor scratches sometimes add to the value. In the case of Hess trucks—in fact, most toys—the condition of the box is half the value. Finally, any antique or collectible is worth only as much as someone is willing to pay for it. When the supply is low, collectors will pay a higher amount for an item just so they can own it. When the market is flush with goods, the value of those items goes down. Knowledge is essential to making good antique purchases. Therefore, a person who owns or finds antiques must learn something about them before offering them for sale. Because of the current demand, the bowl which may have been acquired as a premium can be sold now for several dollars. Your ability to recognize antiques will be greatly aided by viewing a restored historic house or village. Every year, more and more of them open to the public, and almost every state now has at least one. More than one restoration visitor has been reminded of a 19th-century duplicate consigned to a cupboard at home as too ordinary to be considered an antique but too good to throw away. So before you pay someone else to tell you what your pieces are worth, it would pay you to do some digging on your own.
