and then a 1/2 page flap turns to reveal the missing animal's friend, for instance, "Here is my koala friend." At the end of the book, a boy is asked where his friend is by the animals, and the flap reveals his dog friend.

I had never actually heard of it before so I must have had my head buried in the sand and I soon discovered there were heaps of EJ books out there. My girls were excited by the cover and the title. The book is only 4 chapters. It is mere 43 pages of large print and pictures on about a third of the pages. I read the first 2 chapters in one night and the remaining two chapters the next night. They both sat glued to the book the whole time. I probably could have read it to them all in one sitting. It took about 20 minute total to read aloud from cover to cover. There was a simple code to solve which Miss 6 found easy and very pleased with herself that she could do it without any help. It started my first letter is in man but not in can. I would have liked to have seen something like this in each chapter to challenge her thinking. The favourite part for Miss 4. I am keen for us to get some more EJ Spy School books and will be suggesting to grandparents and Santa that these are great books for a budding reader. Walter Wick Over exciting objects to search and find! Kids will have fun using their eagle eyes to spy all the hidden clues. Packed with tons of interesting and fun things to find. Chapter 2 : How to Hide Facebook Friend List from Others: Edition

A fun book to play peekaboo with zoo animals: a monkey hiding near a coconut tree for an elephant to find him, a koala hiding behind a cactus bush for a kangaroo to find him, a colorful turkey hiding in the flower fields for a mouse to find him, and more.

Tons of talent, power, speed, athleticism, defense, skills, and work ethic. I love his boxing technique and recommend it to all fighters. But with that said, his style like many other boxing styles does come with its own limitations. In my opinion, you need to have exactly his qualities to really make it work. The Tyson peek-a-boo style can be very fun to use and also exciting to watch as a spectator. All boxing styles are basically a fighting stance, that allows for specific strategies using specific movements. One underrated feature of this style is that it terrifies opponents when you close distance this way. They prefer you to follow them cautiously with jabs, not run straight in with scary counters. For those who often find themselves having to close the distance shorter fighters, the PAB style is one of the best ways to threaten your opponent. No opponent ever gets to relax when you come in like this. Because it actually goes against the boxing rhythm. Most fighters are ON-rhythm. But when you fight OFF-rhythm, the timing no longer matches smoothly and anything can happen at any moment. This is a helpful timing for landing surprise counters and knockout punches. Mike Tyson is one DUH. Guess who else I would put in the same category. Manny Pacquiao and Ricky Hatton! Both Pacquiao and Hatton are very off-rhythm and also like to slip from the waist side-to-side somewhat like Tyson. If anything, it fits Pacquiao even better since he stands from the southpaw position which benefits from its own inherent awkwardness qualities already. Instead of smoothly rolling off the punch and returning a counter, it quickly slips off the side in a frantic darting motion and the counters with a hard knockout shot. How many older peek-a-boo style boxers have you ever seen? I would say almost none, because it requires so much athleticism and energy. For most boxers, there is only one thing that is fun—which is punching. The peek-a-boo style requires a lot of non-punching movements. Fast footwork to get you into range, quick-shifting head movements to avoid incoming shots, and then more explosive bursts of energy to land the big punches you worked so hard to set up. And the PAB style requires a lot of energy to be spent on non-punching movements. Detractors of the peek-a-boo style often claim it wastes energy. The lazy guys or older guys prefer to spend their energy only on counter-punches. The energetic guys will happily spend their energy doing everything—bouncing around the ring, moving the head even when not getting punched, throwing feints, throwing set-up punches, throwing combinations. Energetic guys love pressuring, and pushing the pace, reaching for the shot every time. The relaxed guys prefer waiting for the perfect moment. Do you even HAVE more energy than your opponents? Do like spending lots of effort getting into position? Does it excite you to bounce around the entire time? Do you move your head naturally without having to be told? Or are you the opposite? A relaxed thinker who prefers to move only when movement is needed? Or maybe you prefer the safety and simplicity of just blocking. Anyway—take your time and figure out what you really are. If your shots land, they do a lot of damage. This is the price you pay for always going against the rhythm. They can fight well into their older years and seem to never take a hard shot. James Toney can show up to a fight completely out of shape and still walk out without taking much damage. A little mis-step or miscalculation can be fatal for an off-rhythm fighter. Going forward means your opponent has a few more chances to hit you before you can hit them. Well, the first thing is that your opponent has no respect for you and will trade punches until you end up on the canvas. But add a little power and now what? Is it really a coincidence that forward-moving Mexican fighters all have great chins? The reason is simple: Any clean contact was scored as a point, regardless of impact. So one big punch scoring a knockdown would still only register as 1 point, but 5 pitty pat punches would register as 5 points. However, they still judge mostly by the number of punches landed and the bigger problem I think is the glove size and headgear being used. Good footwork, lots of punches, and super clean head-movement. Built like a little tank. Everything was naturally tucked in tight. Did you get that? So from his regular boxing stance, his chin and body were already pretty easy to cover up. What if your body was different? What if your neck and torso are too long, making it hard to cover both the chin and ribs with your arms? If your body is long and wirey, the worse thing you can do in terms of destroying your natural posture and natural way of moving is to try and curl yourself up into a little ball. It slows your punches – taller fighters are punching down; so holding the hands up high will take longer to get to the target. Longer arms can be held a little further out; putting them by the chin means your punches have to travel longer before they can hit the target. Tires your arms – long arms have the advantage of parrying punches from farther away. By keeping your arms close, your long arms have to work more to block and counter-punch. You might do better just moving backwards and letting your opponent walk himself into your punches. Do you even need to do all that fancy head movement? Think about it for a second. But what if you could counter just standing where you are. Look at Wladimir Klitschko. Same goes for the longer-armed fighters. In that case, it might benefit you as well to work on keeping a distance maintaining your range advantage instead of closing the distance and putting you in a place where you have to worry about head movement. Longer armed fighters can skip the distance-closing step, and go straight to the explosive punching! You have to know that Tyson had to move his head so much because he was a shorter fighter. But as soon as he got close, he threw as many punches as he could right away. So my point is: Tyson threw as soon as he got into range. The defense was only used to get into range. Tyson always had to go forward, and threw when he got into range. The Essence of the Peek-a-Boo I think there are elements of the peek-a-boo that are crucial for all fighters, no matter what style of boxing they use. Good head movement, explosive punching, and intelligent reflexes will never go out of fashion. Even Mike Tyson himself was a collection of other fighters that inspired him – Jack Dempsey and Roberto Duran were the most influential. Patterson, Torres, and Tyson all had their own unique version of the peek-a-boo. I can see it in Gamboa, Hatton, Cotto, Pacquiao, and just about half the beginner fighters at any gym. Tyson was one of the most exciting boxers ever. I admire him and greatly respect all his abilities. On a higher level, I also respect all the difficulties he had to overcome in becoming one of the most powerful fighters to have ever lived. His style was a result of having to overcome his natural disadvantages. To see fighters copy his success would be fantastic. But to see them [unknowingly] ingrain his disadvantages would be a mistake. The peek-a-boo is a beautiful piece of boxing art and deserves to be preserved and evolved in boxing history. When used by the right kind of fighters with the right body type and temperament for the style, it is beautiful. But when done incorrectly, it just goes against conventional boxing logic and creates unnecessary hardships. Did you learn something?

Kennedy to President Lyndon Johnson. Among the elemental figures in forging that path was Allen Dulles. He was the most powerful, and, it appears “the most sinister” director of the Central Intelligence Agency. Studying how this worked is a worthwhile pursuit. We see the irrepressible Allen Dulles, who should by almost any standard have been considered a possible suspect for a role in the assassination, instead appointed to the Commission. This crucial historical question has been the subject of misguided speculation for many years. The story apparently began with Lyndon Johnson, a man not known for his devotion to the truth. But the idea that LBJ would huddle with the man he considered his rival and tormentor, in order to discuss the politically sensitive composition of the commission, is ludicrous. After leaving the Kennedy administration, McCloy joined a Wall Street law firm where he represented anti-Kennedy oilmen Clint Murchison and Sid Richardson, with whom he had done business since his days at Chase Manhattan. It was the national security establishment, not Bobby Kennedy, that advised the new president to put Dulles and McCloy on the Warren Commission. And Johnson “finely tuned to the desires of the men who had put him in the Oval Office” wisely obliged them. The Dulles camp itself made no bones about the fact that the Old Man aggressively lobbied to get appointed to the commission. And, of course, if Dulles was on the commission, that would ensure the agency would be safe. Donovan, a Washington journalist. After he took his place on the commission, Dulles recruited Corson to explore the Jack Ruby angle. After spending months pursuing various leads, Corson eventually concluded that he had been sent on a wild-goose chase. Allen Dulles had a lot to hide. These same voices were raised on behalf of McCloy. In fact, the commission was, from the very beginning, an establishment creation. You always do what is best for your country. I found that out about you a long time ago. But, undeterred, Dulles continued to push the commission to keep a tight frame on Oswald. For an eerie parallel in Tamerlan Tsarnaev, the purported mastermind of the Boston Marathon bombing, see this. Actually, passports were rather easy to obtain, Dulles observed. How could the board run a credible inquest when it had limited investigative capability of its own and was largely dependent on the FBI and the other security agencies for its evidence “agencies that were clearly implicated in the failure to protect the president? The Warren Commission was, in fact, so thoroughly infiltrated and guided by the security services that there was no possibility of the panel pursuing an independent course. Dulles was at the center of this subversion. For part 1, go here. Related front page panorama photo credit: GOV Where else do you see journalism of this quality and value? Please help us do more. Where is My Friend? (A Hide And Peek Book) by Simms Taback. Blue Apple Books. Board book. POOR. Noticeably used book. Heavy wear to cover. Pages contain marginal notes, underlining, and or highlighting.

Happy Tuesday, my friends! On Saturday , I announced to you all that I am writing a book. My first chapter is about stress, anxiety, and depression, and effectively dealing with it. While this may seem dismal, fear not! So while some topics may seem more serious or somber, I want to share this message: I hope you enjoy this excerpt. So many days, I did school from 8 A. I was so scared that I would not get everything done, and of course I did, but I barely made it. School became where I got my identity, and not who I knew God saw me as; that was poisonous. I placed so much of my worth on how much work I got accomplished, and for that year and the next, stress became my way of life. I was absolutely miserable. Maybe you can relate. Or like in my case, a schoolaholic. Anything that takes up most or all of our thought life becomes greater than God in our finite minds. Stress is like an ache, something that gnaws at the depth of your soul. It consumes every thought, and every decision is made with whatever is wrong in the back of your mind. It is so painful, so often unbearable, but many times, it seems inescapable. But we are not without hope. Sometimes I think that I must be responsible for everyone else, and every problem in the world, and that so often causes me uncalled-for stress and pressure. That is a beautiful thing, and something none of us can live without. Because we know that the world is in the hands of God. We know that He sees all. We know that He wants the best for us. Yet, we spend days worrying and nights sleepless over what we cannot change. We have pain, we suffer. But this world is not our home, and the way the world works is out of our control. We have to let God be God, and let Him be in control. So, what do you think? Would you want any more excerpts of chapter 1 this month? Let me know in the comments! I made a wallpaper for my iPod yesterday, and wanted to share it because I thought it really fit. This is one of my favorite Bible verses ever. And oh my word, graphic design is so.

Grady Hendrix Published Date: Abby and Gretchen have been best friends since fifth grade, when they bonded over a shared love of E. But when they arrive at high school, things change. Gretchen begins to act different. Gretchen, her favorite person in the world, has a demon living inside her. And Abby is not about to let anyone or anything come between her and her best friend. With help from some unlikely allies, Abby embarks on a quest to save Gretchen. But is their friendship powerful enough to beat the devil? As well as that, I never really read horror novels. First and foremost, I really loved the setting in time and history. Hendrix weaves in elements of the time, such as roller-skating parties popularity, the judgmental mindset a lot of privileged people had at the time, and the love for E. It was very well embedded and wove in effortlessly. So much so that it almost seemed like the kind of world building you get in a fantasy novel. I also really liked how all the chapter titles were songs that were popular at the time. Yet at the same time, it did match with the events of the upcoming chapter as well. I was also completely creeped out by this novel as you should be when reading horror! What creeped me out most about it though, was how realistic and plausible it was. If you eradicate the demon completely and pretend that this is only happening by the manipulation of a person who decides they hate you, it could still happen! Someone could have the power to twist and manipulate the people and evidence around you so that it paints you to be the bad guy that everyone should hate, while they keep an innocent face to hide behind. The thought that this could happen in real life was what had my skin crawling more than anything else. This book was suspenseful. The book had me caught between its pages! The writing style was pretty simple and it was written well. It suited the story. The hardcover edition had a few yearbook formatted pages in the beginning and I really liked that it had that to it. In fact, I wished it ran through the book a bit more because it really complemented it well. Gretchen and Abby were also friendship goals! At least, at the beginning of the book before the whole demon possession began. I loved how tight they were, and how they knew each other inside and out. Although when they are teenagers Gretchen and Abby become integrated into a four-way friendship group, you can still see their friendship is the strongest. I liked seeing that balance because I used to have a friendship group for a few years where there was five of us, but I felt a stronger friendship to some of the people. So, it was nice to see that represented. The reason I had to give this book four stars instead of five was the ending. It really ruined the overall effect of the book for me, because the ending was a bit too happily ever after and convenient. I really believed there should have been more repercussions for the characters, or at least their friendship should have significantly changed in some way. I also think the ending spanned a few too many years quickly, and unnecessarily drew out the timeline. It was a bit disappointing to finish that way. However, I really did enjoy the book overall and cannot wait to read his other novel. I think this goes to show how unshakeable friendships can be. It says something important about forgiveness and loyalty as well, and I appreciated seeing that in the dynamic that Abby and Gretchen share.
