November 5, Author: Since this is all my life has consisted of for about a month, I thought, hey, might as well do a blog post on it! So here goes nothing, tips from a veteran Biology student about Biology: In the exam, you will need to know nearly-exact definitions. Find out what those key words are. The maintenance of a relatively stable internal environment around certain limits. Figure out what your strongest learning style is, and follow it: But if I stick up a pretty picture, it all suddenly makes sense! Really pretty Biology videos: And remember to include labels. You learn about the structure of proteins in order to understand enzyme functions. You learn about movement through membranes to understand signal transduction. You learn about genetics to understand evolution. He also knows the updated VCAA study design for Biology, and so only explains the things that you will need in the exam. This is good for the last few weeks before the exam, when you really want to hone in specific knowledge that you need according to the VCAA. Use all three learning styles. Use your textbook More specifically, use the glossary and diagrams spread throughout the textbook. Use it for definitions. Same goes as above. Active revision is always better than passive revision, and unless you have heaps of time and have covered every other revision technique, do not resort to this extremely boring and non-effective method of studying. Examiners want straightforward, to-the-point answers. The only way you will know how to be Goldilocks and judge whether your answer is too little, too much, or just right is to do practice exams over and over again until you get it right. These are preferably the most recent exams. Do one question, then check it. The basic rules for this method are: In the weeks before your exam, then try doing it under test conditions, with the time, uncomfortable chair, limited stationery etc. I learned about this technique by reading this interview with a past Biology student who achieved a You need to make one so that you can: For me, this was about biomacromolecule structures, allopatric speciation and hormones. How do you make a mistake sheet? Instead, take a break and revise by reading about contemporary issues related to Biology such as: Gene therapy issues, our ancestral origins debates, vaccination issues.
